Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand that any State would have a right to prohibit this bank, authorized as it is proposed to authorize it, from doing business within their territorial limits. I think it is competent for Congress to authorize banks of this character to have a place of business with branch offices in the various States.

Mr. CAFFERY. If this bank were a bank of issue, I concede to the Senator that it could be authorized to establish branch banks, but the business of the bank is confined, in my opinion, to business of purely an individual character. It has not any governmental functions to perform. It does not perform any of the attributes that the United States can perform in the matter of regulating currency or regulating commerce. The power to establish banks under the commerce clause of the Constitution was derived from the power of the banks to issue currency, and in that respect to regulate commerce, but as to discounting paper, receiving discounts, negotiating bills of exchange, whether with foreign powers or not, it occurs to me that no bank chartered by the United States to perform these functions could establish its branches in the States and do this sort of business of a purely private bank character against the will and consent of the States.

Mr. TELLER. This bank will have an unquestioned right to do business in the District of Columbia. There is no question about that. It can do business, then, in the State of New York, provided the State of New York does not object. I am speaking of it as an institution not performing any governmental function. The State of New York will consent, very likely, that it shall do business in New York. They have a method in New York and in all the other States by which they allow foreign corporations—and they are all foreign in the other States as well as abroad—to do business. Unless this bank performs some governmental function it will have no power in the States except what the States give it. That is my judgment.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he thinks the General Government has any power to charter a bank except it be for the performance of some governmental function?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not think it has. Therefore I answered as I did a moment ago. If the Senator from Georgia was listening, he would have remembered that I said—

Mr. BACON. I was called momentarily from the Chamber and possibly did not hear the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I said there was no specific function designated by the terms of the bill, yet it was, after all, an incorporation for the purpose of discharging this particular governmental function, namely, assisting to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign countries. I said it was authorized by that provision of the Constitution, and it was an agency of the Government in that respect.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon; I was absent from the Chamber momentarily when the Senator made that explanation. The Senator, then, understands this charter to be designed for the purpose of aiding the Government in the regulation of interstate commerce. Am I correct in that? I should be glad if the Senator would call attention to the particular section which is intended to carry out that purpose. Will the Senator kindly refer to the section of the charter?

Mr. FORAKER. I will read from the report made by Mr. BROSIUS, which I referred to a while ago, and which will be printed as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator is speaking of the powers of the company, I should like to have him refer to the particular charter power by and through which the Government will perform the function of regulating interstate commerce.

Mr. CAFFERY. Through the banks?

Mr. BACON. Yes; through the banks. Then I should like very much—

Mr. FORAKER. I do not say to regulate it. The provision of the Constitution is that Congress may be empowered. I will read the exact clause:

The Congress shall have power . . . to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Now, that does not mean simply that the Congress shall say upon what terms the products of other countries shall be brought into this country or the products of this country shall be exported; but it may mean a great many things. It means, among others, that Congress shall have the power to create governmental agencies to facilitate the conduct of our commerce and trade with other countries. That has been held repeatedly by the Supreme Court, and in the report made by Mr. BROSIUS to the House of Representatives, and to which I referred a moment ago, some of the authorities are cited.

I will not take the time now to read them, but, considering them now in that light, as an agency established by the Government for the purpose of facilitating our trade with other countries, you will find, in the enumeration of the powers this bank shall be invested with, that it has the power to handle exchange and to do a great many other things having relation to trade, whereby our trade will be facilitated and whereby it will be unnecessary hereafter, as has been the case heretofore, that we shall trade with those countries through the banks of London and elsewhere in Europe. It is in that general sense, and it is no other specific sense that I know of.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, of course no one disputes the fact that there is a constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce between this country and foreign countries and also between the States, but the point I desire to ask the Senator to give me definite information upon is whether this bank is intended to exercise those governmental functions; whether it is intended that the Government of the United States shall delegate to these private parties the official functions of regulating commerce between this country and foreign countries and of regulating commerce between the States?

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me a moment. He says "no," I understand.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; I have said "no" all the time, as repeatedly as I have been asked. I say no in that specific sense, and I say it is an agency simply in the sense that it facilitates these transactions; that is all.

Mr. BACON. If it is intended that this shall be a governmental agency, it is a very serious question. If it is intended that this shall be a governmental agency in the performance of these very great functions, I say this measure ought to have very careful consideration. If it is merely the charter of a private institution for the purpose of carrying on commerce, it is one thing.

Mr. FORAKER. That is what it is. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me to say again, it is a private corporation intended to carry on the business which it is expressly authorized to carry on, and the constitutional warrant for it is found in the provision to which I have referred that ex necessitate it facilitates general commerce. It is not an agency of the Government in any such sense as the Senator speaks of, as I understand him.

Mr. BACON. Very well; we now come back to that point. I originally asked the Senator whether it was competent for Congress to charter a bank which was not intended to perform some governmental function. The Senator said it was not. The Senator said he did not think it was competent for Congress to charter a bank unless it was clothed with the power to perform governmental functions; in other words, that the general business of incorporating companies for private purposes is not a part of the business of Congress. When I ask as to what those particular governmental functions are, the learned Senator, as I understand, says that they are not governmental functions, but that they are the private business of a private corporation, in the performance of which the general business of the country will be advanced.

Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment. Of course I dislike to make any suggestions which may be unfriendly to the bill which has the support of the Senators who are evidently interested in its passage, but at the same time I think it is an extremely grave and important matter. I have been unable to appreciate any suggestion which has been made of the advantages which are to flow from this bank. I am unable to recognize the correctness of the suggestion made by the Senator in his opening remarks that this bank will have any power in foreign countries that a bank would not have if it were chartered by a State. I do not think it will have one.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, I did not say this bank would have any more power in another State. Well, possibly I did say what amounted to that, too. What I meant to say was that no State, according to the provisions of its constitution, where I happen to know anything about the State constitutions of the Union, has power to authorize a bank to go into the various States and transact banking business, much less to go into foreign countries and transact international banking business, as this bank is authorized to do.

I did not contend in that connection that this bank, because chartered by the National Government, would have by reason of that fact power, regardless of the wishes of foreign governments, to go into foreign countries and there transact business; but I say it is competent for the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of the constitutional power to which we have referred, to invest a bank with the power that this is to be invested with or to establish any other agency or facility for the transaction of this business with other countries which may, in a general way, have the effect of regulating, if you want to use that word, the commerce of this country with the other countries. It remains a private corporation engaged in private business, not a governmental agency in the particular sense in which you speak of it; and yet it is an agency established by the Government for the facilitating of that business and in that sense warranted by the Constitution, as I understand.

Mr. BACON. If it were necessary that the General Government should charter a bank in order that that bank might have power to exercise corporate functions in a foreign country, there would be a sound basis for the application for this charter. But such, Mr. President, is not the fact. Any independent sovereignty even within such limitations, as our States exercise such sovereignty, has the power to make a corporation. It has the power to give that corporation all powers not prohibited within its own borders, and it has the power also to authorize that corporation to go into a foreign jurisdiction. Of course, the exercise of those powers in the foreign jurisdiction must necessarily depend upon the consent of the foreign jurisdiction; but the State has the same power to clothe a corporation with corporate power that the General Government would have if it had no limitation upon the incorporating of companies.

The Senator says that no State, so far as he knows, has the power to clothe corporations with powers which could be exercised in a foreign State. It is done every day, Mr. President. I do not know how it is in the State of Ohio, because I have never had occasion to look into it, but the State of New Jersey (and I mention that simply because it is one of the most prominent States in the granting of charters) has flooded this country with corporations which have their home in New Jersey and which never intended to exercise any corporate functions in New Jersey, but which were designed to be exercised in other States. A very large proportion of the corporations which do business in New York are chartered in New Jersey, because New Jersey has peculiar facilities for the incorporation of such bodies corporate.

The general proposition is that a corporation chartered in one State is limited to the confines of that State, except so far as it has the power committed to it by another State. That was settled in the great case of Earle against the Bank of Augusta, in 13 Peters, where the whole question is discussed at length and very learnedly. I was about to say that that decision was by Chief Justice Marshall, and I believe it was, but I am not sure. However, it is the leading case on that question, and under it there can be no doubt about the proposition that a bank chartered in one State can exercise in another State by consent of that State, every power enumerated in its charter, except so far as it relates to anything which is connected with the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio proposes an amendment to section 23 which has not been stated by the Secretary. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 23, page 25, line 1, after the word "That," it is proposed to strike out all of the bill down to and including the word "but," in line 4.

Mr. FORAKER. I withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FORAKER. Section 23 being reinstated, I now offer to amend it as follows: Strike out, in line 1 of section 23, the following words: "no tax shall be imposed upon;" strike out of line 2 the words "except upon real estate held by it;" and strike out in line 4 the word "but;" and then insert so as to make it read as follows:

SEC. 23. That the property of said corporation shall be subject to taxation by any State, municipal, or other authority having jurisdiction thereof within the United States the same as other like property, and the several stockholders shall be liable to assessment and taxation upon the shares held by them at their respective places of residence according to the true value thereof, and to the same extent and in the same manner as other personal property is there assessed and taxed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Ohio in charge of the bill that in all corporations of this sort chartered by the States or by the United States there has always been a limitation as to the amount of interest that might be charged by such corporation on their loans. I do not find anything of that kind in this charter.

Mr. FORAKER. There is nothing of that kind in this charter. No question of that kind was raised in the committee or considered by the committee, so far as I have knowledge. I do not know why it was not considered, but I assume that the reason for not undertaking to fix a rate of interest is that this bank is to do business in foreign countries where the conditions may be very different from those existing here and that a rate of interest which we might fix might not be satisfactory there.

Mr. PETTUS. I am sure we should not grant the charter without putting some limitation on the amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator in charge of the bill, which arises out of a new state of facts which has existed since the bill was reported. When the bill first came to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I felt stubbornly opposed to it. It seemed to violate those traditions under which I have lived and which I have cherished, not without benefit, as I think, in my own opinion, to my course as a legislator in this body against the organization of corporations by the United States Government, in the first place, and, secondly, the organization of banks of issue by the United States Government. I have always been opposed to the national-bank system because it permitted institutions chartered by the United States Government to issue bills to circulate as money.

I did not suppose that my assent to this bill could be obtained when we first entered upon its consideration. But the bill is predicated upon a resolution that was adopted by the Pan-American Congress here, which I consider was the most important international assemblage that ever existed on this hemisphere. It was far more important than the Panama Congress or any other congress that we have ever had to regulate relations between the American States. That pan-American assemblage was composed of the ablest men who could be selected from all the different American States. They were not politicians. They were statesmen, jurists of the very highest character, and their proceedings have been and deserve to be very influential upon opinion in the United States and will continue to be so for years and years to come.

In that Pan-American Congress was laid down the basis of commercial and international cooperation between the States of the Western Hemisphere, commencing with the United States and going south, which will ripen in its fruits into the greatest possible results to this country. But the process is necessarily to be a very slow one. When commercial lines of intercourse are established, when grooves are made in which commerce flows backward and forward chiefly under the control of finance, with the facilities for financing the operations of commerce, it is very hard to break them up.

There is no task which confronts the United States now that is more difficult than that of initiating into the South American States, fertile and rich as they are, the traffic that justly belongs between the people of the United States and those Republics in the South. We have had no trouble in, I might say, propagating, or at least spreading, or permitting to spread, the influences of our political system, and we have seen results from that which are greater than any person had a right to expect at the beginning of this century, and results which go on increasing in magnitude and in importance and in the excellence of their fruits day by day and year by year with astonishing rapidity.

But our commercial intercourse with those South American States and Central American States and Mexico have not kept pace at all with the spread of our influence as a political power, a power having correct principles of government to rest upon, and having had the opportunity greatly improved, by our example, of convincing those States of the beneficence of our institutions.

Now, the task lies before us of opening up commercial facilities, commercial intercourse, between these Spanish-American States, for that is what they are, and the United States. The great convention, the Pan-American Congress, that met here, after very considerable, long, and careful debate and examination, adopted a resolution, and that resolution is embraced in the bill. I will read it:

Resolved, That the conference recommends to the Governments here represented the granting of liberal concessions to facilitate inter-American banking, and especially such as may be necessary for the establishment of an international American bank, with branches or agencies in the several countries represented in this conference.

Mr. President, there never was an invitation extended to the United States that had greater, broader, more important, or deeper significance than this very one. The question is, Shall we suffer it to die from neglect? Shall we abandon it on our part when the United States was selected as the Government which should create this agency of banking, or shall we improve the opportunity and commence to carry out the wise suggestions of this great congress?

Sir, unless I can find in my way some constitutional objection or some grave objection of policy which stands against this bill, I am bound to support it. The necessity is obvious; the advantage of it is very great. The demand is made upon the assurance of all these different States, without a single dissent, that they want this thing done.

In some of the comments which were delivered in that body we have the opinion of the minister from Costa Rica. That is a small

State, but it is a State which has always been represented here by a very able minister. Mr. Calvo, who has been the minister here for a number of years, is a man of great wisdom and great ability. The delegate from Costa Rica said:

I believe that undoubtedly if the United States desired to encourage commercial relations with our countries, it would be necessary for it to offer us its capital, as has been done by the other nations—Germany, England, and France. Capital affords facility, and facility, as a natural consequence, encourages the commercial relations between countries.

That was his argument. In the course of the discussion of the same resolution the representative from Brazil remarked:

We need to have such institutions because there is no connection to-day between the consumer and producer.

That is a very important matter, Mr. President, particularly as we get probably two-thirds of our coffee from Brazil.

We need just such institutions, so that we can take a bill to the bank and open the necessary credit. The necessary machinery in the way of these proposed institutions is lacking, and therefore I give my vote to a report which fills the necessary element in our relations.

The representative of Mexico in that conference said upon this subject:

That bank, of course, needs the sanction of the Government of the United States for its establishment, for, needing branches in the other nations, these could not be established without this sanction.

This may not be the most efficacious means to develop commerce, but as an institution of credit is always an advantage to the country having it, and as an international bank is proposed, I see no objection in carrying this idea out, which may give practical results to the countries interested.

I will not quote further opinions. These are important opinions delivered by men of eminent ability.

Now, let us see the situation as it is. A large part of the goods which are sent to South America, particularly all the goods that require rapid transit, are sent now, and have been sent for years, first to England and thence to South America. The passengers who go from this country to South America, almost without exception, pass first to England and thence to South America. When we send a minister to South America or a chargé d'affaires or any person to represent our Government, he first makes the journey across the Atlantic Ocean to Southampton, or some place in that vicinity, and there takes shipping for South America.

All cargoes that are not paid for in barter by the exchange of commodities are paid for by exchange upon the Bank of England or the Bank of France or the Bank of Germany; but when you go to get exchange upon a bank in the United States, you have no national institution, you have none that by its charter or its organization recommends itself to any of these South American States. They know that the affairs of the Bank of France, of the Bank of Germany, and of the Bank of England are under governmental control, and that those Governments are going to see that the officers of those banks perform their duties under the sanction of severe criminal laws.

Now, we will take the national banks of the United States. Those in New York doubtless furnish a good deal of exchange, perhaps a large amount of exchange, to South American and Central American countries, but that is exceptional; that is not the rule. The rule is that the exchanges between the United States and even Mexico and all of South America, in the main, are conducted through the Bank of England, some of them through the Bank of France, and some of them through the Bank of Germany; but the Bank of England is the great monopolist, as has been said here, of the traffic and exchange between the United States and all of the Spanish-American States.

That, Mr. President, is to be altered in some way or other. It can not be altered by compulsion; it must be done by an inductive process; it must be done by starting in the United States established institutions under governmental control, in which those foreign countries can trust their deposits, upon which they are willing to draw their bills of exchange, and bills of exchange drawn upon which they are willing to receive in payment for their commodities.

In what respect is it national? In no respect at all, except that it is under national control, under national espionage and examination from day to day and always. That creates in favor of this institution amongst foreign countries a reputation and confidence in its integrity and the integrity of its management which is of vital importance to the whole subject.

The question may be asked, Can not a national bank furnish that same guaranty? Yes, that is very true; but a national bank is an institution which is intended for carrying on commerce and trade almost exclusively in the United States, and is so regarded by outside nations. It does not answer the purpose which is required by the resolution of these wise men; that is to say, it is not a great American national institution, which, like the Bank of England or the Bank of France, stands up to represent the country and the Government—not actually, but through its influence, through its power, through its reputation in the conduct of the facilities of exchange between our country and other countries.

Why should these men have resolved that it was necessary to have an institution of this kind if the national-bank system, which is in full force and was then in full force in the United States, could supply all of these demands, or if this aggregation of power and influence could be found within the purview of the charter of a bank created by a State?

In doing this, Mr. President, we have got to meet the views, and I might say even the prejudices, of our foreign customers. We can not control them in their opinions and their views; and if they say that such facilities are necessary for commerce, then we ought to make them. Why ought we to grant them? Because there is no harm in it; there is no danger in it; there is no monopoly in it.

But this is the first occasion when I have heard it suggested at all by anybody that perhaps it would be a dangerous thing to create a monopoly which might interfere with the national banks of the United States. They have got all the powers they need and all that they want, in the name of conscience, and if this institution can be organized by the commercial men of the United States, who have great credit and great reputation for ability in financial matters, I do not see that there can be any rational objection to its adoption. I did not see it in the committee, and my objections, which have hitherto been, as I supposed, chronic—I knew they were chronic, but I supposed they were really based upon sound principles—melted away, and I do not find that they exist.

Now, turning for a moment to the constitutional question, first of all, the real operations of this bank—called a bank, but it is a board of exchange really—while they are not confined to our intercourse with foreign countries and foreign patronage, are largely predicated upon that, and that will be the basis of the business of this bank—exchanges in America with foreign countries. Is there any constitutional objection to that? On what foundation was the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States rested? We do not find in the Constitution any express warrant at all for the institution of a bank or establishing a bank.

There is not a man in the world who ever undertook to track it up as a specific grant of power to organize or charter a bank; and yet the charter of the Bank of the United States, assailed, perhaps, as vigorously as any institution has ever been by the ablest lawyers that this country afforded, time after time has been supported by the Supreme Court of the United States as being a constitutional enactment. That was an enactment which combined the private ownership of stock with governmental ownership of stock, an enactment which extended its authority by creating branches out amongst the different States of the American Union, and it so offended Maryland as that Maryland put upon the bank institution that was located there enormous burdens, with a view of breaking it down. These were all cleared off by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the foundations of that national bank were found to be resting upon that broad principle of the Constitution of the United States which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations.

While that perhaps is not the only foundation, that is the main foundation of the constitutionality of the United States Bank. That foundation is here. We extend it now to foreign countries, not that we have got the power to establish national banks or branches of national banks in foreign countries without their consent, but we make the overture, we extend it, and if, according to this resolution and this invitation, they accept that extension of authority from us, of course that closes the arrangement between our country and their countries, and after that there is no difficulty between them at all.

Has not the Congress of the United States more power to legislate in the control of commerce and the regulation of commerce with foreign countries than it has got within the United States? I hold that it has. I hold that there are many powers of the United States Government which belong to it as an aggregation of supreme sovereigns which it may exercise in defining and establishing and promoting and protecting arrangements with foreign countries, particularly of a commercial and of a postal character, which do not obtain within the States, for the reason that within the States and for the benefit and the protection of the States themselves and the people of the States these limitations upon the powers of Congress were made in the Constitution.

The limitations upon the powers of the States, and the limitations to protect the rights of individuals which are found in the Constitution of the United States were not intended for the protection of foreigners residing out of this country and beyond our limits. When they make an appeal to us upon a question of that kind, "Are you not exercising more power than your Constitution authorizes you to do?" it is the same appeal which is being made now every day to us in respect to our occupation of the Philippines, the annexation of Hawaii, and the occupation of Cuba and Puerto Rico. Magazine articles, emanations from men of distinction, statesmen, and the like, are coming to our attention continually that we are violating the principles of our own Constitution when we do not apply to our external relations those limitations and restrictions which were intended to apply only within the limits of the United States for the protection of the States and for the protection of the individual American citizens.

Sir, when we get beyond our borders, while I do not contend that our authority is swelled into comparison, perhaps, with that of the imperial countries of the world, like Russia, Great Britain, etc., yet outside of our borders there is not a country in this world which has more power inherent than the United States. I do not say that of any officer of the United States or of the President of the United States; but I am speaking about the United States as a political entity, as a political power, which has the right to regulate its affairs and its destiny in connection with the affairs and destinies of foreign countries. That is what I am talking about.

So that when we get beyond our borders, and I consider the effect of an international bank beyond our borders in the regulation of commerce, in the facilitation of the necessary arrangements of a financial sort or the commerce we have with other countries, I do not find that these restrictions and limitations, for which I have a perfect reverence within our own borders, apply to the case; and they do not check me in my desire, my zeal, and my determination to do what I can to facilitate commercial intercourse between this country and foreign countries. I think we make a misapplication of our doctrine to questions of this kind.

In the regulation of commerce with foreign countries, in the regulation of postal affairs with foreign countries, we take the largest liberty by our legislation, and no person has yet found a restriction which the Supreme Court was ever willing to sustain to limit our authority in dealing with foreign countries; but you can find plenty of things which the Supreme Court does sustain when you come to apply similar enactments to the relations of the people of the different States with and toward the Federal Government. So I find no difficulty in the Constitution, nor do I hear any suggested here to-day.

This bill may be called a monstrous bill, if you please to call it such, but let us see in what respect it violates the Constitution of our country; in what respect it is a usurpation of the powers of Congress. I maintain, Mr. President, that we have a right to do everything that any other government can do to facilitate commerce with foreign countries. When we come to interstate commerce, that is a matter of quite a different complexion, dependent upon different ideas and principles. So I find no constitutional difficulty in my way about this bill.

As to the matter of policy, I have already alluded to that briefly, and do not expect to enlarge upon it. But, Mr. President, there is not a merchant in the United States who has any intercourse with one of these Latin-American States who does not feel the embarrassment that he is laboring under that we have no great institution here in which these men are willing to make their deposits, upon which they are willing to draw drafts, and upon which they are willing to receive drafts in payment of dues that occur from day to day and hour to hour in our commercial exchanges. And if Great Britain, France, and Germany find it expedient to establish branches and agencies of trade or great national banks in the Spanish-speaking countries of America, why do we not find the same necessity, and why do we not make alike provision? The necessity for it, Mr. President, is so obvious that it has attracted the attention of all commercial men of any note in the United States, I think, and certainly in that great congress I have spoken of it attracted the attention of all the delegates there, and they unanimously resolved that this thing ought to be done.

Since that occurred a new vista has been opened before us unexpectedly, unsought, and uncompelled on our part. If, Mr. President, there ever was a dividing of the waters so that the dry land appeared and the army was invited to march across to enter upon a new life or a new expedition to a new country, that thing has opened before us within the last two or three months. No man can impute to the United States Government that it has brought on this war with Spain, or that it has in any way aggravated it, or promoted it by any desire to have a war, by any spirit of conquest, or any other matter connected with the aggrandizement of our Government in any respect.

The war has been forced upon us because the conditions which existed violated all of the principles of our Government and violated all of the laws of humanity, and the future was a dark and a desperate one to us unless we removed the cause of this trouble. We saw that we could never live in peace with the people of the Island of Cuba under the dominion of the Spanish Crown. We saw that plainly, and when the working of that institution as a government in Cuba became such as we could no longer tolerate it, war ensued.

When the war ensued, and when we declared war in this Chamber after much debate and without any heat or asperity of feeling, quietly, absolute necessity forced us to vote that a state of war existed between Spain and the United States—when that occurred almost any of us would have considered it perhaps a wise movement, and a fortunate one, if Admiral Dewey had been compelled to return from Hongkong, from which he was expelled by the British authorities, to the United States and hug the coast of California, Oregon, and Washington, and stand for the defense of our country against Spanish invasion; but God would have it otherwise, and when Admiral Dewey was expelled from Hong-kong he was compelled from the necessity of the occasion to seek a coaling point, a point of refuge somewhere else nearer even than Hawaii, and he made his attack under the authority of the Government of the United States—not under a plan of campaign, but an authority which he might resort to in case of necessity—he made his attack upon Manila and won for us practically then—it will result that way—the control of eight or ten million people, with enormous trade, a country of vast importance in its productions and in its commerce, and here we are with that on our hands. Is it a white elephant, or is it an acquisition which has got some value? That depends, Mr. President, upon how we act about it.

Then, coming along up, there lie the Caroline Islands, and there is Hawaii, which is about to be annexed to the United States, and here is Cuba, and here is Puerto Rico, that will have to be provided for. Let me ask the Senate, and let me ask the Senator who has this bill in charge, can there be a more opportune occasion for conferring upon the United States and the people concerned in these proposed conquests of the United States—I will call them conquests for the present—can there be a more opportune occasion for establishing just such a fiscal agency as we have got here, and will it not, if we establish it, draw to the United States more of trade and more of commercial influence and power than anything we could do? Once we get the groove cut, the forces of the earth never can change it; and there is not a bill which is before the Senate, in my judgment, which in its prospective effects will have a finer effect than this, provided we put in the proposition that branches of this bank may be established, not only in the States of the American Union, but that they may be established also in countries which fall within the jurisdiction of the United States by military occupation or control.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly I will.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Alabama speaks of this bank as a fiscal agent. Now, if it is true that this bill is proposing to take a new departure of incorporating a great bank, which shall be the fiscal agent of this Government in dealing with the other governments of the world, certainly nothing more important can come before this Senate for its careful consideration than this bill, and it is not a matter to be considered with empty chairs in the Senate Chamber. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] denies that it is intended as a fiscal agent for this Government.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not want debate, if you please. If you will ask me a question, I will answer it. I have the floor.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I beg the Senator's pardon. His criticism is correct.

The question I wished to ask the Senator was if the Senator in the use of the words "fiscal agent" intended to take issue with the Senator from Ohio, who denies that this bill is intended as a fiscal agent of this Government?

Mr. MORGAN. If I used the words "fiscal agent," I certainly did not use them with the idea that the bank was to be a fiscal agent of the Government.

Mr. BACON. I certainly so understood the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I disclaim it; and you understand it the other way now.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator disclaims it now, then what he has said about the Government using this bank in its intercourse with all the proposed possessions upon which we are about to enter certainly does not apply.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not speak of this Government using this bank in any of its affairs. I spoke about the merchants of the country using the bank.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Georgia is mistaken. What the Senator from Alabama said was that the people of this country—

Mr. MORGAN. Of course.

Mr. FORAKER. That it would be a fiscal agent for the use of the people, thereby facilitating commerce.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I want this bank, or this fiscal agent, if you please—I will call it a bank, so as not to make any mistake about the definition of it—I want this bank to have branches in those countries which we are to occupy and have already occupied to a large extent, and I want that done by act of Congress.

Mr. PETTUS. Will my colleague allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to his colleague?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to address the Senate against the passage of the bill, if nobody else does. I had not intended to do so, but I want an opportunity to do so. I have just been sent for to make a quorum in the Committee on Military Affairs, and I ask unanimous consent that there shall not be a final vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. FORAKER. Of course if the Senator can not be here, I will not ask that the bill be put upon its passage to-day. If he wishes to be heard upon it, the bill can go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon that assurance, the Chair feels justified in assuring the Senator from Alabama that the vote will not be taken to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. The state of the law in this country on the subject of the powers of the President of the United States when he, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, occupies a foreign country under a declaration of war, is ascertained and settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in such a way that, in my opinion, it is necessary for us to prescribe to the President certain regulations and to give to him certain powers which he may exercise in those Spanish countries which he is now occupying as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, so that the relations between the Government of the United States and the military governments, or whatever they are, which he may establish in those places shall be somewhat defined.

I do not feel disposed this afternoon to go into the cases or into the different phases of the question which arose in the course of the war with Mexico. That is the war which brought these questions to the front. There are several decisions and very carefully considered opinions of the Supreme Court, and they, at some time or other, ought to be brought to the attention of the Senate, because we have got to act upon this situation with some kind of legislation.

But I confine myself on this occasion to that portion of the legislation which I think would be appropriate upon this bill, and I suggest an amendment to the bill that branches of this bank may be established under its provisions in any country that may be occupied by the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, whatever the language ought to be, so that when we go and occupy these countries we will have the legislative authority in this country to establish these banks there.

Mr. FORAKER. I will remind the Senator from Alabama that in committee we considered it, but I agree with him that the situation has changed since that time.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. We then thought we would confine the bank to the Western Hemisphere. We did not expect at that time to have any special need for a bank elsewhere. I thought at the time that there could not be any valid objection to inserting after the countries named "and other countries." Banks are not going where there is no business for them and where they are not really needed, and wherever they are needed we want them. I as one member of the committee and having the bill in charge should be glad to have the amendment suggested by the Senator from Alabama made.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no possible phase of the questions that relate to the United States in its further action as to these foreign countries which to my mind is more important than that of regulating the finances of the countries; and in an amendment which I intended to offer here to the tax bill, and which I declined to offer because some gentlemen thought it might be considered in the nature of an obstruction, I proposed that the President of the United States, while in the occupancy of these countries with arms, might institute there the currency of the United States as legal tender; that whatever currency was legal tender here should be made legal tender there for the different purposes of legal tender prescribed in our statute, my object being to enable the Army and those connected with it and our people at large, in making contracts for property or in the payment of debts which necessarily occur in the presence of our armies in these places, to have a standard for the measurement of debts the same as that in the United States; that there should be perfect harmony in the circulation of our money; that instead of having the Spanish peseta, which is the unit of value in all these Spanish countries, the legal standard of that country, we should take the money of the United States as the legal standard, and let it be received in the payment of debts and in the purchase of property and in the payment of taxes or dues or customs of the United States just as it would be in the United States.

We can establish that there by authority of law, but the President of the United States can not establish it so that it will last a moment longer than the war, for the moment the war ceases then the civil authority comes forward in all its power, and our statute laws spring up to prohibit anything of that kind; and there must be a time, a hiatus in the government itself, during which there will be great financial disturbance unless we provide for it in advance. I can see that if this bill becomes a law and these branches are established in Cuba, Puerto Rico, in the Philippines, and in Hawaii—perhaps Hawaii stands on a different footing—there will be a facility for intercourse of a commercial sort that will be of enormous benefit to the Army.

Suppose such an institution were established here now, with an agency in Cuba. Our soldiers employed there, when they draw their money, instead of having to transmit it in silver, or in whatever else they are paid, across by ships back home, would have nothing to do but ask the Government of the United States to make a deposit of their pay in this bank and they could draw against it; they could have a certificate of deposit. Nothing could more greatly facilitate our intercourse during this time of war; and so with our foreign ministers in any part of the Western Hemisphere. I wish it was so all over the world, that instead of having to ship money to them or buy exchange upon London for the purpose of paying our foreign ministers and the different attachés, we could send them drafts upon this great national institution of the United States in which we would have confidence because we have the supervision.

I do not pretend that there may not be objections to the bill. I can only say that I have not got the foresight and experience, perhaps, to point them out if they exist, and I am obliged to take part of the bill upon the trust which I think I can repose in my own judgment simply rather than in my own experience, for I have no experience in financial affairs worth speaking of. But in the thirty-first section there is the power reserved to the United States to repeal, alter, or amend the act in any or all respects. If we find that the system is working awry in any particular, we have the reserve power to correct it, and the question is whether because of difficulties that may spring up or have sprung up in the way of this institution, we shall abandon it. If any Senator here, Democrat or Republican, can state to me any great, solid, constitutional objection against the enactment of the proposed law, I will vote against the bill. I am bound to do it. But I do not see it.

I trust that those Senators who may be opposed to the bill will point out what the constitutional objections are, and not merely appeal to some ancient prejudice or some ancient idea or creed, if there is any, that exists against the United States bank, for this is not the United States bank. It is not a bank of issue. It does not create any inflow of money into any country in the world, and can not do it. It is merely a bank of exchange and discount, and as such it occurs to me it is not only innocent, but it is one of the most valuable contributions that the United States has ever made toward facilitating commerce between this country and the Spanish-American States. It is a subject I like to dwell upon, and I should like to speak on it longer, but I do not think I ought to tire the Senate in order to gratify myself.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, with the general scope and purpose of this bill I am in thorough accord. I believe that the United States should undertake to establish as many instrumentalities of exchange to facilitate trade between our country and foreign countries as the necessities of the case require. There is a very strong argument, in my opinion, for the authority to incorporate this bank under an act of Congress.

The purpose of the bank is set out and declared to be "to carry into effect the recommendations of the International American Conference by the incorporation of the International American Bank." This instrumentality, reported by the committee to carry into effect the recommendations of that conference, may effect the desired result. I think it will largely tend to facilitate trade and intercourse between the South and Central American countries and the United States, which was the purpose of the International Conference. The facilities of exchange between Europe and the United States are amply provided for by our national banks.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] stated an economic truth in answer to a suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, which is very pertinent to this discussion, when he said that banks would be established in Manila or in any other country if they were needed. If there were that course of trade between the United States and the South American countries to justify a deflection of the course of exchange from London to America, I think that result would come about of itself. If our trade relations with the South American people were as extensive and as important as they are with Europe or with England, we would have Buenos Ayres and New York or Rio and New York in as close contact by bills of exchange and other methods of remitting money and paying for commodities as we have London and New York.

But the argument seems to be advanced that this bill is a departure from old methods or an inauguration of a new method. It is termed a monstrosity. No bank, in my opinion, is a monstrosity. A bank, especially a bank of this character, a bank of deposits and discounts, can under no circumstances be a monstrosity. There is nothing novel in a bank of deposits and discounts. The States are full of them. The largest part of the business of the national banks consists in receiving deposits and with those deposits discounting commercial paper. So I find nothing objectionable on that score. The more of these banks we have the greater the prosperity is indicated to be by their presence. Without the necessity for them, they would not spring into existence.

Mr. President, as we all contemplate the increasing of the trade between the United States and the countries to the south of us, I do not think it is at all unwise to provide the machinery of exchange whereby the trade relations between the United States and those countries can be facilitated, even if we have to anticipate the future to some extent.

Now, it has been held by all statesmen and jurists that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate all the instrumentalities of commerce either of a material kind, as steamboats, railroad companies, or transportation vehicles, or of a credit character, as bills of exchange or currency designed to circulate among the people. I can not see in my own mind any distinction between a currency which is only issued to serve as the medium of exchange and a foreign bill of exchange which answers the same purpose. It is the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign countries that is invoked, and that, I believe, applies. Mr. Webster very strenuously argued in the great debate upon the United States Bank that the United States derived their power to establish the bank under the power to regulate commerce and to facilitate the fiscal operations of the Government.

It is true that in the United States Bank the United States was a stockholder and the banks were made the depositories of the public collections, customs, and so on. But he based the power to establish a bank upon the power to regulate commerce; and a very powerful argument is made in the report of the House committee that as the power to establish a bank is derived from the power to regulate commerce, and the bank is to issue and negotiate and deal in these instrumentalities of commerce among the States, therefore the power of the United States to incorporate the bank is amply granted by the Constitution.

But, Mr. President, while the power to incorporate this bank as a private institution is one thing and the power to establish a bank by the United States is another, it does not follow that the Congress can not incorporate a private bank whose purposes are to afford instrumentalities to carry on foreign or interstate commerce. The United States has ample power to establish banks to carry on its own business, to aid in carrying on the business of the community, and in regulating commerce among the States and with foreign nations.

Why has not the United States the authority to incorporate a private bank that performs the same function as a public bank owned by the United States or in which the United States holds stock? It is the functions of a bank that govern its character. If, therefore, a bank carries on exchange with foreign countries, and the main purpose of its incorporation is to carry on that exchange, what good argument can be adduced against its constitutionality? Why is not the incorporation of a bank by Congress, for the purpose of facilitating, carrying on, augmenting, you may say creating, foreign or interstate commerce just as legitimate as to incorporate a bank with the power to issue currency?

All political economists, and everybody who is at all familiar with business transactions, agree that the vast volume of the exchanges effected in the United States as to the commerce among the States and with foreign nations is made by substitutes for money, bank checks, bills of exchange, and other credit instruments used by these corporations. If that be true, and these bank credits, this bank paper, are used just as much to effect exchanges, and thereby regulating commerce, where is the strength of the argument that a bank of this character can not be established under an act of Congress?

Mr. President, the argument goes further. I believe that Congress has authority to incorporate any bank the main purpose of which is to deal in foreign exchanges, either among the States or with foreign nations, and unless it can be shown that the same argument which will authorize the creation upon the part of the United States of a bank to issue currency differs in any material respect from the argument that a bank may be incorporated under the United States to deal in that which is as good as currency, which performs the same function as currency, then I say there is no good argument against the incorporation of this bank.

I do not believe that the incorporation of this bank for this laudable purpose, this constitutional purpose, will create trade between the United States and the South American Republics. The vast volume of our trade is carried on with England and the continent of Europe. There is less than 30 per cent of the volume of our foreign trade with South American countries. The European nations have much the larger portion of that trade. Banks follow trade. They do not precede trade. Whenever there are those trade relations which I hope will take place and which I think will take place between the United States and South and Central America, then I believe banks will follow.

I believe that a bank incorporated by Congress is superior to any State bank, for the reason that it inspires confidence in foreign nations. When you have a bank under the control and supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, a bank designed for the express purpose of negotiating exchange with foreign countries, then you give confidence to the people who deal with that bank as to their exchanges. That is the great advantage that a bank incorporated by the United States will have over a private or a State bank and over a bank incorporated to operate in a State under the United States laws.

I think the general purpose will be effected better by incorporating a bank under the United States law to deal in these exchanges with foreign nations as its prime purpose and object than by other banks not so incorporated, not having such a public purpose in view. The ordinary business of this bank is laid out in the eighth section, which is simply the ordinary business of every bank. It is to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, etc. In that respect the bank does not differ from any other bank. Every bank has that power. That is the purpose of a bank. That is the main purpose. I should like the honorable Senator from Ohio who is in charge of the bill to emphasize this purpose of dealing in foreign and interstate exchange.

Mr. LINDSAY. Where is this bank to do business? Where is to be its principal place of business?

Mr. CAFFERY. Wherever it can negotiate exchange.

Mr. LINDSAY. It is to have a headquarters, a banking house. Where is its principal place of business to be located?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not know.

Mr. BACON. It is to be in Washington or in the city of New York.

Mr. FORAKER. In the eleventh section the Senator will find that provided for.

Mr. LINDSAY. Thank you.

Mr. FORAKER. It says:

That the principal office and place of business of said corporation shall be in the city of Washington, D. C., or in the city of New York, in the State of New York, as the board of directors shall determine; and the directors shall have power to open such additional branch offices in the United States, etc.

Mr. CAFFERY. In line 55, page 11, after "bills of exchange," I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if he would amend by inserting "especially all foreign bills of exchange" it would emphasize the business of the bank and set it out better than its title does.

Mr. MILLS. Would the Senator from Louisiana prefer to proceed with his remarks in the morning, and let us have an executive session this afternoon?

Mr. CAFFERY. My remarks are pretty nearly finished. I will conclude in a few minutes.

Mr. FORAKER. The term as employed in the bill was thought to be broad enough to cover foreign as well as domestic bills of exchange.

Mr. CAFFERY. I think so, but as the matter appears to be—

Mr. LINDSAY. Before the Senator takes his seat, I wish to ask him whether he holds that the Government of the United States can establish a bank to do business in a State, which exercises no Federal power whatever, merely because it incidentally may advance the interests of foreign commerce, without even asking the consent of the State?

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator from Kentucky by his question assumes that dealing in foreign exchanges is not a matter within the purview of the Federal power. I differ with him in that regard. I think that a bank can be incorporated by Congress to deal especially in foreign exchange as an instrumentality of commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and that the same power to regulate commerce by issuing currency is possessed by Congress to regulate commerce by authorizing the issue of bills of exchange. As they are both instrumentalities of foreign commerce, I do not see how you can make a distinction between them.

I asked of the Senator from Ohio the same question that the Senator from Kentucky propounds to me. I must admit that there is some doubt about it. It is not so very clear that by incorporating a bank which is to perform the ordinary functions of a bank, which is to deal in foreign as well as in inland exchange, you thereby regulate an instrumentality of commerce in the purview of the Constitution. That is a proposition of a character involving some doubt.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am glad to hear the Senator say so.

Mr. CAFFERY. But the more I think of it (and I never did think of it until the bill was brought before the Senate this afternoon; I never saw it before) the less can I see any material distinction between regulating one admitted instrumentality of foreign commerce and another. A bill of exchange is just as much an instrumentality of foreign or interstate commerce as a bank note.

It effects the same purpose. It transfers commodities. It transfers credit. It answers in place of money; and the power to create banks, to regulate commerce by issuing notes, is a conceded power. Whether it is a private bank or a public bank makes no difference, because whenever power to do a certain thing exists it can be exercised by any appropriate means or instrumentality.

Mr. ELKINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRYE. Can we not pass the bill to-night?

Mr. ELKINS. Not to-night.

Mr. FORAKER. I will say to the Senator from Maine that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] wishes to speak on the bill, and he can not speak until to-morrow.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from West Virginia withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

STEAMERS SPECIALIST AND UNIONIST.

Mr. FRYE. I have a telegram from the Assistant Secretary of War which requires me to ask the Senate to consent to the present consideration of the bill which I report from the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 4763) to provide American registers for the steamers Specialist and Unionist was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamers Specialist and Unionist to be registered as vessels of the United States, provided that they shall not engage in the coastwise trade of this Republic.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from Mr. Meiklejohn. There is no need of reading it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The telegram will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegram is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 13, 1898.

To Hon. W. P. FRYE:

The two British steamships Specialist and Unionist mentioned in H. R. 10338 are fitted up and ready for our use, and are needed, and we are ready to charter them; but owners say that, by chartering ships under our charter they will be violating the English enlistment act, with penalty of confiscation of ship and imprisonment, unless they had American register. Can the act be passed soon?

G. D. MEIKLEJOHN.
Assistant Secretary of War

CLAIMS UNDER THE BOWMAN ACT.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 4936) for the payment of war claims which have been favorably determined under the Bowman Act was amended by the Senate and passed as amended. At the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] I ask to nonconcur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, is this that $10,000,000 bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; but they want to get rid of all those additional claims.

Mr. HITT. Will there be any debate upon this?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, no; I think not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to take up the bill (H. R. 4936).

Mr. RICHARDSON. And to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and agree to a conference.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this is the bill about which there is an understanding as to what shall be done in conference?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to know what the understanding is.

Mr. DALZELL. The understanding is that nothing shall be agreed to upon the part of the House conferees except the Bowman claims as they went from the House.

Mr. LOUD. Is that understanding such that it can be depended upon?

Mr. DALZELL. I presume that depends upon the character of the conferees.

Mr. LOUD. Why does not this bill take the regular course?

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is the regular course, to nonconcur and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so.

The SPEAKER. Under the present order it would have to be by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOUD. Would it not have to be so under any order? Would it not first have to go to the committee?

The SPEAKER. That is the usual course.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the request.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMER ARKADIA.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent this morning for the present consideration of a couple of bills granting American registry to vessels that have been chartered conditionally by the Government for the transportation of troops, one to Cuba and the other to Manila. The bills are Senate bills. I think it will only take a moment to pass them. I have received a telegram this morning from the War Department urging haste, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4749) to provide an American register for the steamer Arkadia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Arkadia, owned by the New York and Porto Rico Steamship Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, to be registered as a vessel of the United States: Provided, That the said steamship shall not engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, but shall not be excluded from that between this country and Porto Rico.

Mr. HITT. Will this lead to any discussion?

Mr. PAYNE. I think not. If it does, I will withdraw the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is this one of the vessels which the Government wants to charter for the transportation of troops?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; and the Secretary of War requests that the bill be passed, in order that the vessel may be chartered.

Mr. BARTLETT. As there are several of these vessels similarly situated, why are they not all put into one bill?

Mr. PAYNE. The next bill contains four or five of them, and the gentleman will have an opportunity to refer to that question when it comes up. I do not think there will be any objection to this, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not on my part.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6209) to pension William Stephenson Smith.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to enrolling the bill (H. R. 10100) to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

H. R. 4936. An act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes—to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3141. An act increasing the pension of Price W. Hawley;

H. R. 4239. An act to complete the military record of James Hicks, formerly captain of Company M, Twelfth Regiment Ohio Cavalry Volunteers;

H. R. 10087. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across St. Francis Lake at or near Lake City, State of Arkansas;

H. R. 9554. An act granting certain lands to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal;

H. R. 5040. An act for the relief of Isaac N. Babb;

H. R. 5522. An act to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station at or near Charlevoix, Mich;

H. R. 5149. An act to amend the charter of the Capital Railway Company;

H. Res. 7. Joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for work upon the Wallabout Channel, New York;

H. R. 10100. An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenses, and for other purposes;

H. R. 378. An act granting an increase of pension to Lowell H. Hopkinson;

H. R. 4488. An act granting an increase of pension to Peter Castle; and

H. R. 10920. An act to organize a hospital corps of the Navy of the United States; to define its duties and regulate its pay.

AMERICAN REGISTERS FOR STEAMERS ON PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is one other bill under the same circumstances—a bill for vessels on the Pacific coast. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4740) to provide American registers for the steamers Victoria, Olympia, Arizona, Columbia, Argyle, and Tacoma.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamers Victoria, Olympia, Arizona, Columbia, Argyle, and Tacoma, owned by the Northern Pacific Steamship Company, to be registered as vessels of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DINSMORE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas demands the regular order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman withdraw it for a moment? I have the consent of the gentleman from Illinois to present a matter.

Mr. BLAND. Unless it is a war measure, of great necessity, I shall have to object. Time has been set apart for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

BERING SEA AWARD.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman from Nevada, but I ask his consent to give me a couple of minutes to ask consent for the purpose of passing a joint resolution to pay the seal-fisheries award. The time expires on the 17th of this month. This matter is in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will it not suit the convenience of the gentleman to dispose of that matter after my remarks?

Mr. CANNON. How much time has the gentleman?

Mr. SAYERS. The House has already agreed to this appropriation. It is in the sundry civil bill, and we can not possibly pass the measure through the House before that time.

Mr. CANNON. I regret to interrupt the gentleman with this matter, but it is one that he is more familiar with than I.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman asks unanimous consent for present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10982) making an appropriation to pay the Bering Sea awards.

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the President to pay to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the commissioners appointed pursuant to the stipulations of the convention of February 8, 1866, between the United States and Great Britain, providing for the settlement of the claims presented by the latter against the former in virtue of the convention of February 29, 1892, the sum of $473,151.26 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This appropriation is made without the admission that any liability exists for any loss of prospective profits to British vessels engaged in pelagic fur sealing; or for interest on the sums awarded to Great Britain, and without admitting the authority of the arbitrators to make any award on the basis of damages for the arrest or detention of vessels not included in the submission contained in the treaty.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BALL. I object.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will not object, because the 17th is the last day, and the gentleman's colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], can inform him that this is a very important matter.

Mr. BLAND. This will lead to debate, and I shall have to object.

Mr. BALL. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

HAWAII.

Mr. HITT. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Speaker, I shall not enter into the question of the constitutional power invoked by the opponents of Hawaiian annexation. I shall assume that the United States has all the powers of sovereignty. That it is not to-day prepared to deny the legality or the constitutionality of the processes by which its territory has grown from 800,000 square miles to 3,600,000 square miles; that it is not prepared to-day to contest the validity of the acquisition of Florida, the acquisition of Louisiana, involving the control of the Mississippi and the Missouri valleys, the acquisition of Texas, the acquisition of New Mexico and Upper California, the acquisition of the great intermountain region between the Rockies and the Sierra Nevadas, or the acquisition of Alaska.

I shall assume that if it can acquire continental territory it can acquire insular territory. I shall assume that if it can acquire the island of Key West, off the coast of Florida, it can acquire Hawaii, off the coast of California. I shall assume that if it can acquire Alaska, 1,500 miles away by land, it can acquire Hawaii, 2,200 miles away by sea; that if it can acquire the Aleutian Islands, stretching 500 miles west of the Hawaiian, it can acquire the Hawaiian Islands, 500 miles east of the Aleutian Islands; that if it can acquire territory by the accident of war, it can acquire it by the deliberation of peace; that if it can acquire territory by discovery, by violence, by conquest, and by treaty, it can acquire territory by gift, accepted by solemn enactment of law in which both branches of Congress and the President concur.

I take it that the question of constitutional power is foreclosed by the action of one hundred years, and that the only question to be determined is the one of policy, expediency, and good judgment.

DANGERS OF TERRITORIAL EXPANSION.

We are told that avarice is the besetting sin of nations as well as of individuals; that the pathway of history is strewn with the graves of nations driven by lust of power and avarice of territory into a ruinous expansion, destructive of liberty, destructive of simplicity, destructive of morals, and destructive of virility.

We are told that to grow means danger, and that to dwarf one's growth means safety. We are told that the Hawaiian Islands mean empire, colonial expansion, centralization of power, to be followed by decentralization and destruction; that their acquisition means the beginning of the end. The accidental acquisition of Manila, involving possibly the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, accentuates alarm and creates the fear that a proposition intended only to secure territorial defense and commercial security is the stepping-stone to a policy of imperial aggrandizement.

HOW OUR COUNTRY HAS GROWN.

I shall not attempt to follow the historic parallels which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has so eloquently drawn. I know nothing more deceptive than historic parallels. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that nations, like individuals, have their infancy, their manhood, their old age, and death. It is true that nations must grow and must decline. It is true that governments that have grown into empires have become extinct. It is also true that governments that have not grown into empires have become extinct.

Was expansion the cause of the death of the one and non-expansion the cause of the death of the other? If phenomenal growth is a sure sign of early decay, then the seeds of dissolution are already planted in this Government, for we have grown in one century from 800,000 to 3,600,000 square miles. Our present area is nearly five times as great as that occupied by the Republic in its infancy.

Was it desire for empire and lust of territory, or was it accident, or was it a high and beneficent purpose that led to this enlargement of our territory? There was no need of additional territory to meet the requirements of our population. The entire population of to-day could be put into the thirteen original States without overcrowding them. Part of this territory was acquired by war, part by negotiation and purchase, but it must be conceded that the central idea was to rectify our boundaries, to extend our western frontier and remove European powers from possession of contiguous territory, and to separate us by vast oceans, lakes, gulfs, and rivers from possible enemies whose proximity would occasion the maintenance of large military establishments as a means of defense.

And so we expanded under the conviction that our boundary on the south should be the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande, on the east the Atlantic, on the west the Pacific, and on the north the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes; and later on, foreseeing that, by the process of peaceful evolution, Canada might become a part of our Union, Alaska was acquired as the only other foreign possession between our territory and the Polar Sea.

Our country was to be a great commercial union of States, bound together in such a way as to secure them from external foes and from external conditions of adversity. There were to be no custom-houses at boundary lines to restrain interstate trade; no standing armies for offense or defense against neighboring States. Relief was to be given from militarism, and the productive power of the Union was to be increased by pursuing the arts of peace.

But whilst the States were thus to be free from military contention as amongst themselves, the nation was to be made strong for defense. This involved the creation of a scientific boundary and a growth founded deep in the desire for the prosperity and happiness, the peace, safety, and welfare of a great people.

INSULAR EXPANSION.

Whilst these acquisitions were mainly continental and, with the exception of Alaska, contiguous, the very purpose of the territorial defense necessarily involved the peaceful acquisition of islands adjacent to our coast which could be made the basis of naval or military attack, and which, in the possession of strong European powers, would constitute a constant menace to our coast.

Had our forefathers contemplated the vast territorial expansion since achieved they would doubtless have regarded the acquisition of the Bahamas and the West Indies as important.

They would have realized that those islands would control access to the Gulf of Mexico and would bar the way to the Isthmian Canal sometime to be built and owned by this country, and they would have felt that the possession of those islands by the great powers of England, Spain, and France might be as hazardous to our peaceful isolation and our commercial supremacy as the occupation of contiguous continental territory.

Could they have foreseen the growth of naval power they would have realized that foreign aggression would take the form, not so much of invasion by military force, but of naval attack on our merchant-marine engaged in the coast trade and upon our coast cities, and that such an attack could not be successfully made without convenient coaling stations such as these islands afforded. The very policy which embraced the acquisition of contiguous continental territory ought also to have embraced the acquisition of the adjacent islands, whose annexation would increase the distances between us and possible foes.

In enlarging our boundaries, one of the legitimate objects to be obtained was to secure the outposts beyond our defensive line, the possession of which by a hostile power would make its attack more effective.

The recent operations of the Spanish fleet from the Cape Verde and Canary Islands as bases, a movement which created alarm and apprehension along our entire coast, demonstrated the value in war of a naval station even so distant. It demonstrated that an attacking fleet can be more effective than a defensive fleet with a long coast line to protect, for the attacking fleet knows the point it intends to attack whilst the defensive fleet must scatter its energies along an entire coast.

It has been fortunate that our first modern experience of warfare with European powers has been with the weakest of the second-class powers—a country bankrupt in resources, corrupt in government, and inefficient in action. No pen could picture the result had Spain been a first-class naval power, with the Canary Islands, Puerto Rico, and Cuba as bases of supplies and attack.

Geographically the Bahamas and the West Indies belong to this country as a part of its defensive line, but owned, as they are, by great powers, the task of acquisition will be difficult and, with their large population of half-breed and inferior races, may be undesirable. But if these islands had only the limited population of Hawaii to-day and should be freely offered to this country as a gift, the statesman who would successfully oppose their acquisition would be execrated by posterity.

I contend, then, that the vast acquisitions made by this country have strengthened rather than weakened it; have diminished the chances and opportunities for militarism, have minimized the chances of continental wars, have increased our capacity for defense, and have secured the development of an empire dedicated to civilization, good order, good government, and peace. I contend that the reasoning which led to these acquisitions applies to the islands near our Atlantic coast, though I admit that present conditions render their acquisition impossible and, perhaps, undesirable, and that their number makes the task of complete defensive isolation difficult.

PACIFIC COAST.

But how is it with our Pacific coast? Can we secure there advantages regarding the possession of adjacent islands which we have failed to secure on the Atlantic coast? We have there a coast line, including Alaska, twice as great as that of our Atlantic coast. Between Alaska and our States lie the British possessions. That ocean is nearly three times as wide as the Atlantic Ocean. We already bound it on the west and north. What confronts us on the Asiatic coast? Japan, a rising military and naval power, possessing to-day a navy superior to our own, spirited, self-assertive, and aggressive.

What other powers? Russia, reaching out for the ocean, determined to obtain an outlet to increase its maritime power, England, France, and Germany all contending over the division of the Chinese Empire. On the Asiatic coast the great navies of the world will be concentrated. The contest of the future will be over the commerce of the Pacific Ocean. Are there any islands off our Pacific coast like the West Indies or the Bahamas in the possession of foreign naval powers? No; the islands of the Northern Pacific are few, not many.

From San Francisco to Hongkong, a distance of 7,000 miles; from the Aleutian Islands to the Tropics, a distance of about 5,000 miles, lie the scarcely populated Hawaiian Islands—2,500 miles from San Francisco and 4,900 miles from Hongkong—possessing a limited soil of great fertility, unsurpassed climate, and an incomparable harbor.

These are the only islands that it would be necessary for us to acquire, for whilst they are not so near to our Pacific coast as the Bahamas and West Indies to our Atlantic coast, they are near enough to form the base of attack by a hostile power, and they are the only islands adjacent to California from which such an attack could be made. Distance is relative. Recollect that the Atlantic is much narrower than the Pacific. We might well hesitate to attempt to secure all the islands in the Atlantic Ocean near our coast because of the hopelessness of the task. We might be deterred from it by reason of the fact that the European coast itself is not so far distant as to make a successful naval attack by a European power impossible.

But recollect that the Pacific Ocean is so wide as to make a naval attack from the Asiatic coast impossible without recoaling, and the Hawaiian Islands offer the only facilities for that purpose. The Hawaiian Islands are eight in number, with a population of 100,000 people. The two existing harbors of Honolulu and Oahu are incapable of economical defense, but Pearl Harbor, 9 miles from Honolulu, is capable of being so fortified at small expense as to defy the navies of the world without the aid of a supporting navy. It is a large lagoon, landlocked, except on the ocean side, to which access is barred by a coral reef through which a drift can be easily made.

When made, the harbor could float the navies of the world, and yet the narrow approach to it could be so protected by mines and fortifications as to enable it to defy the navies of the world. In its defensive capacity it resembles the harbor of Santiago de Cuba, which to-day, though protected by inferior fortifications, holds at bay our entire Navy. It could only be taken by a land attack, and the troops necessary to attack it would have to be brought nearly 5,000 miles from the Asiatic coast.

It is estimated that the expenditure of half a million dollars would adequately fortify and protect this harbor, and that a regiment of men would be a sufficient defensive force, except, perhaps, in times of war. It would be invulnerable from the sea. A land attack would be almost impossible because of the long distance by ocean to be traversed by an attacking army.

One regiment of the Regular Army, aided by a militia composed of the resident population of whites and Kanakas, could successfully resist any attacking force without other aid. General Schofield states that during our late war many Kanakas served in the Union Army and that they made excellent soldiers.

What elements of weakness, then, attach to these islands as a defensive outpost of our coast? Will Pearl Harbor require a large defensive navy? No; it can protect itself. Will a large occupying army be required? No; the resident militia, aided by a regiment of regulars will meet every requirement.

In case of attack aimed by some great power from the Asiatic coast we would send the soldiers and ships to Hawaii for additional defense, but how much better to concentrate a small force there than to scatter a large force along our entire Pacific coast, to increase fortifications, to increase warships, and to prepare for the general defense of a long line of many thousand miles, leaving defenseless Hawaii to be captured by the attacking power, and used as an effective means of raiding our entire coast from the Aleutian Islands to San Diego. Admiral Walker says that we could fortify the Hawaiian Islands for less money than it would take to build one battle ship.

With Hawaii as a base, Spain, if in possession of a sufficient naval power, could destroy our merchant marine on the Pacific coast, capture our ships returning from Alaska with gold, and keep the entire coast in an agony of apprehension. Without Hawaii no naval power could aim an attack on us from the Asiatic coast, as recoaling would be difficult, if not impracticable. What navy would be guilty of the folly of starting from Hongkong for an attack upon our Pacific coast, 7,000 miles away, relying only upon colliers for additional supply? A storm might scatter them; an attacking force might sink them.

Numerous contingencies might occur creating disadvantage for the attacking navy and advantage for the defensive navy. With these islands in our possession no hostile attacking force could reach our Pacific coast from the Asiatic coast, and costly military and naval protection would be unnecessary. Without these islands costly coast fortifications and a large navy would be required for coast defense.

DANGER OF OCCUPATION.

We are told that there is no danger of the occupancy of these islands by any strong power. Our answer is that they have been occupied three times in the last century by stronger powers. The Hawaiian Republic is incapable of resisting aggression. It lacks the population and the wealth necessary to defend itself against a strong naval or military power. These islands must fall into the hands of some strong power, or else, with an increasing Japanese population, internal revolution and Japanese control are imminent.

The process of assimilation caused by an influx of Japanese might result in peaceful Japanese control. Can we afford to let these islands drift into the possession of any strong European power? Can we permit them, through the action of existing internal forces, to drift under the control of Japan, that rising power of the Orient, possessing to-day a navy superior to our own—a nation strong, self-assertive, aggressive, reaching out for power? In case Hawaii, discarded by us, is willing to seek the support of some stronger power, could we object? Such objection would be insufferable arrogance on our part after having refused their annexation.

PROTECTORATE.

We are told that a protectorate is the thing. Will any reasonable man contend that we can protect unless the people of Hawaii ask for protection? And suppose they signify their desire to be incorporated into the system of some stronger power, what becomes of our protectorate? How can we guarantee their independence if they do not wish to be independent? How can we protect them if they do not wish to be protected?

Assuming, however, that they desire to be protected, how can we incur the obligation of protecting them without the right to control their action? If we control their action, that means government—equivalent to annexation. If we do not control their action, can anyone conjecture what international complications may result from their arrogance, their indiscretion, or their aggressiveness produced by a sense of security?

SIMPLY A TERMINABLE RIGHT TO PEARL HARBOR.

But we are told that we already own Pearl Harbor and it would be better for us to fortify it and improve it as a coaling station without incurring the obligation of governing the Hawaiian Islands. Would it be wise to run the risk of having a hostile population immediately surrounding the harbor with its fortifications? The island would without doubt drift under Mongolian control.

Could we rely upon their friendliness in case of war? For purely strategic purposes it would doubtless be better if Pearl Harbor were bounded by rocks without population. But are the disadvantages of acquiring the existing population of Hawaii sufficient to counterbalance the advantages gained from having a patriotic and friendly population surrounding the key to the Pacific? The disadvantages are much exaggerated. The population consists of about 20,000 whites, 30,000 Kanakas, 20,000 Chinese, 40,000 Japanese. The whites consist of Americans, English, and Portuguese, all of whom can be easily assimilated.

The Kanakas are a very kindly, intelligent race, gradually becoming extinct. The Chinese and Japanese are there, as a rule, without families, under contract. They are devoted to their own country, and intend some time returning there. The existing Mongolian population, therefore, will necessarily be withdrawn, and under wise exclusion laws there will be none to take its place. The population of Hawaii will necessarily, therefore, be increased by emigration from our own country to islands possessing a limited but fertile soil and an incomparable climate, and thus by the peaceful processes of emigration from our own country the entire character of the population will be changed. The present population is friendly to America.

This movement had its source in the establishment of American missions in the early part of the century. It involves no wrench, no violence. As the President states it, it is a consummation, not a change. The Government is to-day practically American; the people will easily glide into our governmental system. They are now practically a part of our industrial system.

But is it true that we have any perpetual rights in Pearl Harbor? Our rights there are secured by a reciprocity treaty terminable at the will of either party. There is nothing in the language to indicate that a perpetual right is granted, and the history of the transaction shows that there was no such intention.

When the reciprocity treaty was renewed, the Senate of the United States inserted, in addition to the existing provisions for the admission of certain American products free of duty into Hawaii and the admission of certain Hawaiian products free of duty into America, a clause giving to American vessels the exclusive right to enter Pearl Harbor, and giving the United States the right to improve the harbor for such purposes.

Nothing was said as to the time or duration of the privilege, and inferentially the term of the privilege was coincident with the term of the other reciprocal privileges in the treaty, and when the Hawaiian minister, before signing it as amended wrote a letter to Secretary Bayard stating that such was his construction of the clause that the privilege as to Pearl Harbor was terminable at the will of either party, Mr. Bayard, our Secretary of State, acquiesced in his construction.

With this history would it not be brutal in us to terminate the treaty, as is insisted by the opponents of annexation (for their real purpose is to exclude Hawaiian sugar from our country), and at the same time to claim the permanent right to the harbor? How could we justify such an act of aggression? Is any power given to us to fortify this harbor? No. Do we own a foot of territory there? No. Have we any jurisdiction over the harbor itself? No. To fortify this harbor and to land our forces there would be an invasion of Hawaiian soil. To attempt to administer our laws within the boundaries of Pearl Harbor would be practically governing a part of the islands instead of governing the whole.

It can not be taken for granted that Hawaii will give to this country her most valuable possession when we discard all the rest.

The purpose of Hawaii is to obtain security, protection, peace, and good government. Can we deny all this and at the same time seize her only effective harbor of defense and hold it as our own?

ALEUTIAN ISLANDS.

Now we are met by the statement that it is unnecessary to acquire Hawaii because we have already acquired the Aleutian Islands farther to the west, as there is in these islands an admirable harbor, the name of which, I believe, is Syska. I am not informed as to the character, importance, or value of that harbor, nor am I informed as to the feasibility of the tortuous route which he suggests, nor as to the condition of the currents and other matters that oftentimes make the shortest route in distance the longest in time; but admitting all the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] claims regarding it, admitting that it is nearer to go from San Francisco to the north and then to the south in order to reach Hongkong and the Philippine Islands, admitting that Syska is an admirable harbor, I ask, Does that fact minimize the importance of securing the only other harbor in that vast expanse of ocean which can be utilized either for the purposes of war or of commerce?

And while we attach so much importance to the defensive aspect of this station, are we lightly to consider the commercial advantages involved in having the halfway station from our Pacific coast to the Orient, the halfway station from China to the future Nicaragua Canal? So I contend that as a matter of defense to our coast, as a matter of pursuing legitimately the lines which the country has so steadily pursued, of rectifying its boundaries, of securing scientific boundaries that will protect from foreign aggression and minimize the necessity of militarism, we should acquire these islands which lie adjacent to California, and that the distance makes no difference.

The question is whether they are at such a distance as effectively to be used by a hostile power; and it makes no difference whether they are 100 miles from San Francisco or 2,200 miles, provided they can be so used. As I have already said, we have seen the effectiveness of a movement inaugurated by a hostile and bankrupt country, from a base of operations 2,500 miles from our coast.

How effective would Hawaii be as the base of operations of the great power of Germany or Russia in dominating our entire coast, raiding it from the Aleutian Islands to San Diego, intercepting our ships as they come down with the gold from Alaska, destroying our entire merchant marine, darting in here and there with an effectiveness that would necessitate ample military and naval defense all along the line. And here we have a long coast on the Pacific, twice as long as that on the Atlantic, and we hesitate to avail ourselves of the only harbor which, in hostile hands, would constitute a menace to our safety.

COLONIAL EXPANSION.

But we are confronted by the statement that the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands means colonial expansion, territorial expansion, empire. I regard it as an unfortunate thing that this question is to be considered in the public mind in connection with the Philippine question. None of us know how that question is to be determined. For one I trust that it will not be so determined as to involve colonial expansion.

I do not believe in owning islands all over the globe; I do not believe in a system of colonial extension like that of England. Different nations must pursue different lines of expansion and growth. A country that is built up and overpopulated as England is must, in order to maintain its prosperity, its growth and its strength, acquire additional territory. The policy of an island limited in area like that of England, and having a population of vigorous and aggressive people should be entirely different from the policy of a country that has more territory than population, and which should be absorbed in internal problems, not external problems.

The relation which such a population as the Philippines will have to our own, both as to individual liberty, individual representation, and industrial and commercial laws will be so perplexing as to distract us from the consideration of the grave internal problems that confront us. The acquisition of such a population may entirely break down and destroy our industrial system, based upon protection and intended to protect the American laborer from the disastrous competition of the cheap labor of other countries. Whether this is desirable or not may be a matter of contention, but that the immediate effects of it might be a most serious readjustment of industrial and economic conditions, involving distress and suffering to our existing population, must be considered.

I am therefore against colonial expansion for this country. I am for territorial defense. I should have regarded our position as stronger to-day had Dewey met the Spanish fleet in the open sea and destroyed it and then sailed to Cuba, there to unite his forces with Sampson's and Schley's. I believe in concentration of action, not diffusion of action. I believe in steadily keeping in mind the purpose for which we started, which was to drive the Spaniards from Cuba. Involved in that was the destruction of the Spanish navy wherever found, for through the Spanish navy alone could an effective defense of Cuba be made.

Dewey's brilliant victory placed Manila at his feet. He was true to the military instinct in holding his ground and taking possession of the islands as a pledge of security and peace. But the problems with reference to those islands are to be settled hereafter by wise statesmanship. It may be that we have so complicated ourselves with the insurgent chief there, with the insurgent forces that are now arrayed against Spain and are wresting from her by land the possession of her fortifications, that honor and a proper regard for the respect of mankind will demand from us the task of pacifying the islands and organizing a stable and civilized government there.

I would not have the United States unresponsive to any honorable obligation. I would even run the risk of mistakes in our foreign policy rather than do that. But these are questions for the future, serious questions, involving possible acquisition of 9,000,000 people of inferior races, not suited for our civilization, not suited for assimilation with us. Their acquisition involves not territorial defense, not peace, but aggression, conquest, war, international complications. They put us in the theater of action of the great nations of the world and may force us to participate with them in all the diplomatic controversies that may arise.

But no such disadvantages attach to the Hawaiian Islands. The population which we add is inconsiderable. The country has already, by the peaceful process of evolution, assimilated itself with us. For years it has been practically American. American ideas, American liberty, American civilization, prevail there. No violent wrench is involved in their acquisition. No difficult problem of colonial expansion is involved in adding a population of 109,000 people, 56,000 of whom will retire to their old homes within the next five or ten years, leaving the island for the possession of the Caucasian race. No difficult problems of agricultural competition present themselves, for the soil, though rich, is limited and has probably reached its largest development.

I admit that the Philippine question is one of great difficulty. It may involve a readjustment of our entire industrial system. We have thus far promoted commercial union between the States, done away with custom-houses between them, done away with all restraints upon friendship and commerce. We have built up around our country, by the action of both parties, the defensive wall of the tariff to protect our industries and the wage earners employed in them against the cheap labor of other countries and adverse conditions elsewhere.

If it were proposed to-day to add Japan and the Chinese Empire to the United States and to place our protective wall around them all, would New England assent? It would mean the destruction of every manufacturing enterprise in the country, for the tendency, of course, is for every such enterprise to drift to the point of cheapest production.

We, in a measure, protect our laboring people against the cheap labor of Europe and also against the cheaper labor of the Mongolian races by our tariff laws; but there is not an intelligent man who does not realize to-day that the great industrial nations of the future are likely to be Japan and China, and if they were incorporated within our domain and surrounded by this tariff wall we would find our industries transplanted from our own soil to theirs.

As it is, the energies of hundreds of millions of people in China of great industrial aptness are to be loosened, and those energies are to be directed by the great powers of Europe—England, France, Germany, and Russia. We shall feel the force of their competition.

Bear in mind the change that is now going on in the cotton industry. That industry is being gradually transferred from New England to the South. Why? Because labor is cheaper in the South, because the hours of labor are longer, because there are not the same restrictions as to child labor.

We have numerous problems to meet within this tariff wall of ours, problems that involve social questions, the consolidation of capital, the consolidation of labor, the condition of the laboring classes. The time will probably come when, by a constitutional amendment, the hours of labor will be regulated in all the States by the Congress of the United States, when the question of child labor will be regulated by the laws of the United States, for the contention will be made by the laboring classes in those States subject to wise, just, and reasonable restraint as to the hours of labor that other States not subject to such restraint are absorbing their industries.

How would it be with reference to Japan and China, if those Empires were attached to us? How will it be with the Philippine Islands if they are attached to us and our industrial system is applied to them? It will be hard for us to apply the rule of justice and equality to those possessions without inflicting a serious injury on our own people.

But recollect that Hawaii has already come within the scope of our industrial system by the reciprocity treaty. Already she is a part of our industrial system. There is no wrench, no violence. This process of acquiring Hawaii is simply the peaceful process of evolution.

I think, then, with all due deference to the opinions of my friends on this side, that they should draw the distinction between an imperial policy and this question, between colonial extension and territorial defense. It will not do to oppose a just measure on the score that it may hereafter lead to an indefensible measure. Yoke a just measure with an indefensible measure, and they may both go through. Settle the just measure now and leave the indefensible measure to be settled by time, and then you can meet it with argument alone, without its receiving the support of a just and proper measure.

I will not take up time further with reference to the importance of Hawaii as a matter of defense of our coast, nor shall I enter at any length upon the commercial advantages of the Hawaiian Islands. All that has been ably covered by the chairman of the committee and by other speakers. I simply wish to urge that the question of Hawaiian annexation and Philippine annexation should not be yoked together. I wish to urge the view that growth does not necessarily lead to decline. We are told that the insular possessions of England are to-day her greatest weakness; that her colonies are sources of weakness rather than of strength.

Imagine the history of that country had it remained content within its narrow insular boundaries. The only career that such a nation can follow is one of colonial expansion. You may say to her, "Cut off the Indies; cut off Canada; cut off your African possessions." Imagine how quickly she would die. Historians hereafter may declare that England died as a result of undue growth, of phenomenal growth, of territorial expansion; but history will also record that she lived nobly.

We wish that this country should live nobly, that it should pursue the high purposes with which it started out, the purpose of establishing within our domain as far as possible a homogeneous, independent, self-respecting people, capable of war, but inclined to peace; pursuing all the methods that will secure peace; removing from our continent by peaceful negotiations European nations whose proximity threatened continued complications; removing all restraints upon trade between these great States, and securing also such insular territory as is necessary to protect its defensive line, securing the outposts against foreign occupation, placing between this country and other countries vast expanses of ocean, of lakes, and of rivers, and thus securing scientific boundaries, which in themselves will secure lasting peace. [Loud applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him this question: After the acquisition of Hawaii, what is the gentleman's idea about the mode of government that should be applied to it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to answer that question. The resolution which I have introduced provides for the appointment of five commissioners, two of whom shall be residents of Hawaii, to recommend to Congress a plan of government.

It is a matter to which I have not given reflection. I am not prepared to answer, though I apprehend there will be no more difficulty than there has been in the government of any territory which has been attached to this country. There is no difficulty in Alaska. It is true it is not a very complete system of government. It is simple, and satisfies the needs and requirements of that people, and will doubtless grow as the population and wants of the country grow.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman give me attention for a moment? Mr. Speaker, many of the opponents of annexation—and I am not one—allege that the climatic conditions of Hawaii are such that European labor can not endure the climate; that the labor would necessarily have to be carried on by the Asiatic or a similar race. I would like to have the gentleman make some statement covering that point.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no personal knowledge regarding the climate. I understand it is a temperate climate, and not tropical in character, as many suppose. I know it is regarded on the Pacific coast as a great sanitarium, particularly for nervous diseases. A friend of mine who visited the islands last year, who had been a nerve sufferer all his life, told me that was the only place he could secure relief. I do not understand that it is an enervating or relaxing climate.

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman will give some assurance that the annexation of Hawaii will cure jingoism, I will vote for his resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. BERRY. I can state, in reply to the gentleman's question, that the temperature never gets as high in Honolulu as it does in Washington, and that it is never below 63° or 64°.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer the gentleman's question. I will say that the temperature as taken by the officials at Honolulu in 1895 shows that there was only one day in the year when the temperature reached 90°, and that it falls as low as 64°. Seventy-two is the average temperature.

Mr. HITT. I do not see the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Colorado is to be recognized next.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, it may be that the whirligig of time has brought us around to the point where the very nature of things demands that the American civilization shall leave the less advanced civilization of its neighboring islands and those of the distant Orient. It may be that the time has come when manifest destiny shall automatically decree that this exemplary Government shall shed its gabardine of justice, impartiality, and equality, and shall join the Old World in gormandizing its national greed by absorbing all of the smaller governments that come within its reach.

If that time is here, it photographs a dismal future for the weak republics of the Western Hemisphere and for the individual poor of our own country.

The new policy would necessarily break down the cardinal landmarks in the Declaration of Independence and make us but a part and parcel of the caste-ridden governments of Europe from which our forefathers fled.

If we join in this crusade and invade the Hawaiian Islands we must break down the most cherished principle of the Declaration of Independence, i. e., "that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

It is idle to prattle about the present Government being a republic or desiring to be annexed to the United States. It is well known by all who have kept pace with the misfortunes overtaking these islands that the present Government is a pure oligarchy not representing 10 per cent of the people of the island, and representing practically none of the natives. A republic is a government for and by the people. The first law of a republic is to rest the power in the people. The Dole Government has taken all power from the people, and it is in no sense a government for the people. Suffrage or the elective franchise is only given to the wealthy, which includes but very few, if any, natives. An elector for a senator must have $3,000 in property above his incumbencies, or must have received a money income of at least $900 the year preceding the election. The natives have lost practically all of the property of the island.

Mr. LANHAM. What proportion of the real estate of the island is owned by the supposed 3,000 Americans?

Mr. BELL. I have the exact figures right here. The Americans and European whites own 1,052,192 acres; the natives own 237,457 acres.

Mr. MEEKISON. You do not claim that the Americans who went there degenerated as land grabbers?

Mr. BELL. Yes; they succeeded in getting the most of the islands.

The Europeans and Americans pay $274,516.74 in taxes annually, the natives pay but $71,386.82, while the Chinese pay $87,206.10, over fifteen thousand more than the natives.

Mr. LANHAM. Then the Chinese and Japanese and other foreigners already own a great deal of real estate in the islands.

Mr. BELL. Oh, yes. The Japanese and Chinese own a great deal of land and pay a large amount of taxes.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] suggested that ultimately those people would withdraw from the islands.

Mr. BELL. The reports show that they do not withdraw at all.

Mr. LANHAM. If they own real estate there, what right would we have to force them to withdraw?

Mr. BELL. None. Bear in mind that three-fourths of the merchants are Chinamen, not contract laborers, and a great many of them are gardeners and farmers and genuine settlers.

Mr. LANHAM. If we should annex Hawaii, we would have to take those Chinese and Japanese with all the rights to real estate that they have. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. BELL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. Have you any information as to how titles to real estate are derived in Hawaii?

Mr. BELL. I suppose from the Government. They have Government lands there now.

The Senate of the island is given practically a controlling power in the affairs of the island. There are 31,000 natives, 8,000 half-breeds, 24,000 Japanese, 15,000 Chinese, 8,000 Portuguese, 1,000 South Sea Islanders, 3,000 Americans, and 4,000 European whites upon the island, the most of the whites being citizens of other countries. Under the property qualification of voters, out of the 109,000 inhabitants there are only a few legal voters.

The best of evidence has been secured by a personal canvass of the natives and of the non-American population, and it has been found that at least 90 per cent of the population are praying for an independent government. Everyone who has investigated im-partially must conclude that the present Government is a usurping oligarchy installed under the overawing influence of the marines of the American war ships, and that it has no power whatever by the consent of the governed. The governors of the Hawaiian Islands are simply old missionaries and their sons and their grandsons and their great-grandsons. And what do they do? Why, sir, my friend from Illinois, the chairman of this committee, talks about "the bold assertion of American manhood there." I am proud of American manhood. We are the greatest people on the face of the earth. But there is nothing about American manhood in Hawaii or English manhood in Hawaii commendable in their dealings with the natives.

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

Mr. BELL. The gentleman must excuse me. I can not yield now; I have not the time.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply wanted to correct a misstatement of facts.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. BELL. We should not be swept off our feet by the great victory recently won at Manila or succeeding victories that may crown the efforts of our ships and soldiers in the war with Spain. We should not for a moment lose sight of the fundamental principles underlying our form of government and the beneficent results that they have produced during the last century.

Recently, when England threatened to encroach on the territorial limitations of Venezuela, we arose in our indignation and declared that "America is for Americans." This carries with it the inevitable corollary that Europe is for Europeans and the Orient for Orientals. We promptly made a large appropriation, and proclaimed to the world that we were ready to pledge our blood and our treasure to the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine; that is, that no foreign government should oppress any of the weak powers on this continent or in the adjacent islands. England admitted the validity of our claim and our right to pursue this protecting policy. Should we attempt to hold these islands or the Philippine archipelago or any other foreign islands, except as a security for a war indemnity, such an act would operate ipso facto as a renunciation of our further intention to maintain the Monroe doctrine, and the act would proclaim to the world that we had joined the horde of European greed in attempting to absorb as many of the weaker powers of earth as possible.

It may be said that the Hawaiian Islands more nearly reach our shores than they do those of any other continent, and that such annexation would not militate against the Monroe doctrine. This may be true, strictly speaking, but it does directly conflict with the great principles underlying our former governmental policy. We have advertised to the world, by act and by deed, as well as by proclamation, that we stand as the friend and protector of all weak powers on this continent, including its neighboring islands. We have boasted of the grand example we have set to the world, permitting all other countries to be governed as the people should desire. If we take these islands, we must do so in spite of the protest of 90 per cent of the people, and in a spirit which evinces a change of our colonial policy, and it will be a beacon light to lead us on to other acquisitions, until we become a part of the great governing powers of the world in aggression for territory and spoils. When that day comes we will represent no distinct type of civilization, but will be a part of the mass of the European powers, losing all that we have gained for good government and a higher civilization through a century of matchless progress.

THE POLITICAL FATALITIES OF ANNEXATION.

The cardinal doctrine of this Government is that every adult male citizen above the age of 21 years shall have an equal right at the ballot box in choosing officers and in shaping the policy of the Government. If we annex Hawaii, we must treat all of the citizens thereof as political equals and give them the privilege of the ballot, or must make another radical change in the policy of our Government.

There are on the islands, according to the last census, 3,086 Americans, of which 1,975 are males; probably 1,000 of these are above the age of 21 years, and therefore legal voters. There are 40,000 Hawaiians and mixed bloods, and probably 8,000 of these are over the age of 21 years; 24,000 Japanese, mostly all males, and probably 16,000 of them above the age of 21 years; 15,000 Chinese; 8,000 Portuguese, and probably 4,000 males above the age of 21 years; 1,000 South Sea Islanders, and probably 300 males above the age of 21 years; 4,161 white people other than Americans, and probably 1,500 males above the age of 21 years.

If we pursue our policy, we must allow the male population of the islands above that age the privilege of voting. If left to a vote of the people of Hawaii, after annexation, the Americans will have no voice whatever in the government of the island, except that of an infinitesimal minority.

While the people of Hawaii have maintained the most intimate trade relations with us and a most trusted friendship, because they regarded this Government as the friend and protectorate of all the weak governments of the continent and adjacent islands, when it comes to taking the independent Government from the island and merging it into our Government every thought and sympathy of the great majority of the legal voters will be entirely anti-American in governmental policy. It will require a government by the bayonet rather than the ballot to make this heterogeneous people harmonize with our institutions.

OUR IMPREGNABLE POSITION.

The great statesmen of the world have conceded our impregnable position by reason of the solidarity of our territory. We are regarded as the greatest land power ever known to the world. The very fact that we are unassailable at home and have no outside points requiring a great navy has been the envy of all great nations. England has long been mistress of the sea. Her possessions dot every country in the world and are largely composed of small islands. These require her to keep up the greatest navy of the world. While she kept the greatest navy she could control her possessions, but recently she has been weary between two of the greatest powers of earth, Russia and the United States. She has been secure as long as these powers did not aspire to the equipment of a great navy. She saw clearly that the moment a reasonably large navy was added to one of these great land forces, without colonies, her prestige on the seas would fade away.

A few years ago Russia began filling her war chests with gold and building a powerful navy. This at once menaced the supremacy of the English sea power. The recent occupation of the neighboring harbor of Port Arthur, in China, in defiance of the protests of England, demonstrated that the zenith of her supremacy had passed. The combination in Europe seems against her, and now an exposition of the innate weakness of these possessions distributed among all lands and climes is made manifest.

The foreign possessions of Germany have been a curse to the Empire. The foreign possessions of France have been a source of annoyance. The foreign possessions of Great Britain have only been valuable because of her great sea power and facilities for carrying on the commerce between her possessions and the mother country. The colonial possessions of Spain are now destroying the mother country itself. It is openly admitted by Sagasta and others that the colonial possessions have been a curse to the Government, the only benefit being that they have furnished a select few an opportunity to plunder these colonies, as colonial officers. The same thing will occur with us should we adopt a colonial policy. It will be a curse to the great mass of the people, but it will be a blessing to those Americans holding large possessions in the islands and to a certain favorite line of politicians who will become rulers over the unfortunate natives whose possessions we covet.

There is eternal wisdom in the advice of Washington—i. e., "The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is in extending our commercial relations, and that we have as little political connection as possible." And Jefferson added to it the maxim, "Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

We are now reaching the very zenith of commercial glory. This year our exports will exceed our imports by something like $500,000,000 and we will handle a product aggregating from eight to ten billions of dollars. We are daily going to the front in iron, steel, machinery, breadstuffs, the precious metals, and everything that tends to make a country truly great. We are now passing all nations in all great staples. We have everything under the sun to enable a great people to remain great. We have everything in the way of climate outside of the Tropics, and this we do not need or want. Our people are a product of a temperate climate, and we can not move them beyond the latitude of 53° or within 30° of the equator and maintain the high caste that pervades our homogeneous population.

Now, a minute ago, my friend, Mr. PERKINS of Iowa, asked a very pertinent question of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], "Will the American people thrive and will our form of government thrive on that island?" My usually positive friend vacillated a little about it. But I say there is not a case in history where this civilization has thrived under a tropical sun. The American civilization, the European civilization, is an incarnation of the temperate climate. It can not exist anywhere else. The African in Africa has lived through the centuries, but that torrid sun has never allowed the front brain to develop. He might live there until doomsday and he never could invent an alphabet, he never could invent a multiplication table, he never could invent an arithmetic, and he never could adopt a republican form of government. The scientists have told us that from the dawn of civilization there has been a government suitable for every clime. Take the extreme north; the government that has always controlled best is force. Take the temperate climate, where the front brain develops, and they tell us that reason is the controlling force there; but take the case of those within 30 degrees of the equator, and nothing else has ever governed them so well as superstition.

I admit that in Hawaii, on account of topographical reasons, you can get every climate that is known to mankind. You can ascend the mountains there until you reach a point where it frosts in July. But when you come down to tilling the soil, when you come down to where the banana grows, when you come down to the sugar-cane fields, if you put the white man there it will take two or three generations before you get one that will stand the climate. And when you get that type you will get a type but little better than the native himself.

Furthermore, I want to say that the entire cultivation of Hawaii to-day is by Asiatic labor. You may speculate about the American people Americanizing Cuba, Americanizing Puerto Rico, Americanizing the Philippine Islands, but it is a mere dream. It never can be. And I hope to God the day will never come when we shall have a single foot of tropical climate within the bounds of this exemplary Government.

Starting from the seacoast, you may go to an elevation of 500 feet or 1,000 feet or 1,500 feet; and in this way the topography of the country may overcome the geography of the country. When you do that, you can have any climate you want. But in going to these elevated spots you go away from the cane fields, away from the coffee fields, away from the banana fields; you go away from the place where the work is done.

If you annex Hawaii, I expect to see you hold the Philippines. I expect to see you hold Puerto Rico, and you will find that they will never be Americanized. You know the torrid sun of Australia has made the Australian a savage.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no.

Mr. BELL. History shows it. The equatorial Australian is today a savage. The world knows it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Semibarbaric.

Mr. SULZER. They would not admit that down there.

Mr. BELL. No, they might not, because they do not know it. My friend from Illinois the other day made light of the fact that leprosy prevails in those islands. He said it was a very common sort of leprosy that did not amount to anything. But in a report of the Congregational Church, which has 18,000 members in Hawaii, it is shown that leprosy is so bad that the afflicted ones are isolated on an island and the Congregational missionaries were afraid to visit them.

Mr. BERRY. On a promontory which was devoted to them.

Mr. BELL. I say that when you take the islands of Hawaii, you take from the people their government without the consent of the governed. This is a parallel to the Fiji Islanders that our friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] feared to annex the other day. I beg to say to him that the Speaker of this House will never have to fear being swallowed by a Fiji Island representative. The Fiji Islanders have been made slaves to the English Crown. The Fiji islander, when he was invaded by the whites, had a king who never knew of such a thing as a salary. He did not know of such a thing as public corruption. He did not know of such a thing as a combination of property. The inhabitants had enough to eat and enough to wear in their crude way. But by and by when the white man got there, he got this same infernal scheme of getting all their best land. Then he got a bank established and a contract that he was to let the government have so much money. He then got the idea into the king that he ought to have a princely salary. By and by they could not pay their bills and were incarcerated in jail; and by and by they fell at the feet of the Queen of England and said, "For heaven's sake, take the Government, if you will take us out of jail and keep us out of jail." The Queen did it, and said, "Hereafter you may pay your debts in the products of the soil and not in money," and the Fiji Islanders are existing in that condition to-day.

Now, my friends, I want to say to you that the first point I attempt to make is this, that we are taking the country of these natives not because of a necessity, not because of the fact that they have begged us to take them and protect them. These protectors are a few rich men of our blood, of English and German blood. Our friend, Mr. HERR, of Illinois, I think made a great mistake Saturday when he gloated over the fact that in the constitution of 1887 the manhood of America was shown by the way they took hold of the throats of the natives and made them recognize Americans.

I think that was one of the most disgraceful things that an American was ever accused of doing. Let us see what they did. There was a conspiracy of twenty, who took an oath that any five of them at any time who might be chosen would assassinate the King of Hawaii. That is not in keeping with the American spirit. That is not in keeping with the American doctrine. Then they submitted a constitution to the King of Hawaii and forced it upon him, saying that every man on this island shall be permitted to vote, even the foreigners, without interfering with his citizenship in his home government. Is that much like the American spirit? Who ever heard of such a citizenship being put on a people before? American citizens voting in Hawaii and coming home and voting in the United States! Germans voting in Hawaii and going to Germany and voting again! And that is the constitution that was forced upon that Government. I say that that is in conflict with every principle of the Declaration of Independence.

ANNEXATION MAKES AN INVULNERABLE COUNTRY MOST VULNERABLE.

One of my chief objections to annexation is that it will weaken this Government and make an invulnerable country to any European or Asiatic foe a most vulnerable one. I am aware that some men high in Army and Navy ranks contend that the possession of these islands would add strength rather than weakness to our nation. However, such an argument is so inherently weak and illogical that it carries within itself the elements of its own refutation. The islands are 2,083 miles from our shores—almost midway between our western border line and the Orient—isolated and exposed to attack at all times, with no opportunity of receiving aid until a sea voyage of 2,083 miles is made.

It is contended with some plausibility that this is necessary as a coaling station and with it the North Pacific can be completely controlled. It is argued that since the great steam war ship has displaced the sailing vessel success in war now depends principally upon access to coal, and yet these islands have no coal. There is no United States coal probably nearer than 3,000 miles. If you pile up mountains of coal during times of peace from the territory of some of the friendly powers, that will simply make the island a more inviting object of attack should we become involved in a foreign war. In my opinion, before we finish the present Spanish conflict, we will learn that the coal collier floating about upon the sea will be the supply point for all the vessels in mid ocean. We shall find that friendly nations of one power or another will have their great coal ships floating ostensibly to neutral ports, but they will be picked up by the enemy, and her vessels supplied, and the significance of your island harbors as coaling stations will largely fade away.

Should we own Hawaii it would be a constant menace to our great continental tranquillity. The moment a misunderstanding should arise between us and a foreign power a menace would be made not on the Pacific or Atlantic coasts, where the body of our people and our great powers of defense could be reached in a few hours, but it would be made at this vulnerable point, in mid ocean, some six or seven days' sail from our nearest home port. Not only this, but it takes seven or eight weeks to move our ships from the eastern part of the United States to our western coast. We could not depend upon the support of our naval vessels on the Atlantic, and we would be reduced to the dire necessity of not only fortifying the island against attack, but we would have to have a great Pacific navy kept up at all times. We would be compelled to keep, as it were, a great navy for the western coast of the United States. As the present ships are constructed, there is no material danger from an enemy in possession of these islands. By the time they passed from the islands to our Pacific shores the coal of war ships would be practically exhausted and they would have to rely upon the floating coal colliers.

THE LABOR PROBLEM.

A most unfortunate concomitant of such annexation will be the labor problem involved. A few wealthy Americans and European whites will own all of the valuable possessions of these islands. They will inevitably employ the natives or the poorly paid labor of like climates, and will produce untold quantities of the necessities of life, and will pour them into our channels of trade in competition with our laboring classes without the payment of tariff, to the dire ruin of competing enterprises in this country. Our transportation has now reached an efficiency whereby carrying rates are insignificant, or would be, from these islands to our shores, and would be much less than from the interior of our own country to the market places by railroad.

Again, we have for a century been an example to the world, and are entitled to the credit of the great strides made toward a higher civilization during the hundred years. We are really a composite nation, inviting the citizens of every country, with the exception of China, to join with us in developing this higher civilization. We have, through the influence of our surroundings, and of an unexampled temperate climate, progressed as no other country in history has progressed.

Education has become universal within our limits, pervading every class of society. We have untold areas undeveloped and awaiting an energetic and thrifty population and the necessary means for the development. In our partially developed state we produce one-third of the wealth of the world. In the great staples we are now becoming the greatest export nation in the world. Could we confine ourselves to our own territory during the twentieth century as we have during the nineteenth century we would have a population of probably 200,000,000 of the most intelligent and happy people on the face of the globe.

When we change our policy to the acquisition of foreign territory vulnerable to attack at all times, necessarily inhabited by an inferior and unambitious race of people, we take upon ourselves not only the responsibility of protecting them from foreign foes, but from domestic insurrection. We take upon ourselves the obligation of ruling and controlling a population environed with climatic conditions that will never permit them to approach an equality or a fitness to assimilate with our race. We invite a constant irritant into the heretofore pacific and harmonious condition of our national life. We will unconsciously and certainly pass from our present commendable dominating spirit of civic life to the dominating spirit of militarism that must of necessity dominate every country that is upheld by a great army and navy.

MILITARISM.

The founders of our Government feared the aggressions of the military power against the civil more than any other supposed enemy of our institutions.

A martial spirit is innate in man, and in a country like ours, where our soldiers and sailors are matchless and the people are very proud of their skill and courage, this danger becomes inordinate.

The soldier is proverbially reckless and unreliable in business affairs, has no appreciation of the value of money nor any dread of extravagant debt or taxation.

The soldier is ever endeavoring to build up and enlarge the Army and Navy, and to obtain opportunities to display his skill in warfare; therefore it is to be expected that every sailor and every soldier will bend every energy for the annexation of Hawaii or other points which may furnish him opportunity for employment or distinction.

Every owner of a shipyard, coal company, supply company handling war munitions will favor annexation.

Every politician who has an ambition to occupy official position in the islands will be for annexation.

THE GREATNESS OF THE COUNTRY.

I shall not for one moment contend that if we annex these islands, the Philippines, or all the West Indies, this country will not thrive. The country and its institutions would continue to be augmented, but the individual citizen and his opportunities would decay.

Every year we draw nearer and nearer to the caste system of the Old World. No man can look over the military appointments recently made because of the social, political, or financial standing of young men, many of whom were wholly without qualification or experience, without being convinced that an invidious distinction has been made against the efficient trained soldier from the ordinary ranks of society. In fact, it is common talk even among the lads and lasses of the country that applicants for office in the Army or Navy must now present their pedigrees, strains of blood, or social standing rather than their qualifications for the duties of the office. Astonishment is expressed by all classes of society at the boldness with which the President tramples upon the sacred teachings of the equality of our citizens.

Ex-Senator Ingalls, a famous Republican, in a recent letter to the Globe, says:

Our boast has been that we have abolished the artificial distinction of birth and rank and made merit rather than pedigree the criterion of preferment. We must have been wrong, for in the last month we have seen the health, well being, comfort, and fighting capacity of 100,000 men; their food, clothing, shoes, tents, medicine, arms, ammunition, equipment, and pay, involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and the protection of the Government against corrupt and incompetent contractors entrusted to youthful and inexperienced civilians for no apparent reason except the shameless impertinence of influential kindred and greedy politicians with a pull.

Grant's son and his grandson, Logan's son, Blaine's son, Harrison's son, Alger's son, GRAY's son, McMILLAN's son, MURPHY's son, MITCHELL's son, Brice's two sons, HULL's son, Lee's son, Strong's son, SEWELL's son, Astor's son, ALLISON's nephew, and scores of less conspicuous heroes, illustrate the development of political atavism or intermittent heredity, which is one of the most extraordinary features of the past thirty years.

This and the last Administration have evinced clearly the approaching season of caste. Democracy and great wealth have never thrived in the same field. In proportion as an individual grows wealthy his democracy decays. The individual represents the Government in miniature.

It is my judgment that this war is the blighting season of democracy in the United States. Every indication is that the United States will unfold itself in the early morning of the twentieth century into the greatest military and naval power and into the most regal and resplendent aristocracy that the world ever beheld. The mentally dwarfed inhabitants of the Tropics will be the servants again of those in the temperate climates. The ownership will not be so complete nor the responsibility so great as formerly, but the servitude will be more profitable. The people are to blame. They have persistently kept men in power who trampled on every principle underlying a republican form of government.

I shall deprecate the fulfillment of this unwelcome prophecy. I shall deprecate the return of slavery in this country, but with the annexation of the tropical islands this menial labor will certainly be completely controlled and used by their more fortunate brethren there and here. [Applause.]

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it would be fair to compare the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] with the sirocco, the hot wind of the desert, but it would not be inappropriate to compare this Chamber at present to the desert of Sahara, not only in the matter of temperature, but in the barren waste of seats about me.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not go as far toward the North Pole as did the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] in attempting to cross the Pacific from San Francisco to Hongkong; but I do believe that a certain latitude and longitude should be allowed to those of us who address ourselves to this subject, not only on account of the importance of the question involved, but on account of its bearings upon other questions, such as the origin of this war and the conduct of the war and the necessary result and the probable indirect results of the war, and because no convenient opportunity has been thus far presented for such discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I shall give my vote for this resolution for the same reason that I supported the war-revenue bill. I believe that this is a necessary step in the successful prosecution of the war with Spain. I am frank to admit that when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] addressed this House some weeks ago I felt as he did on this subject, that it was an unnecessary and radical departure from the historic policy of this Government; but right here comes the question, if we are going to hold the Philippine Islands, then the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is not only important, but essential.

If we are going to get our share, or any proportionate share, of the great commercial development of the future, of which the seat is certain to be in the Pacific and in eastern Asia, then the possession of the Hawaiian Islands is not only important, but essential. If we are going to build the Nicaragua Canal, then, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the annexation of Hawaii is important and essential, and I venture the opinion just here that even the petrified conservatives on the other side who oppose the annexation of Hawaii are in favor of building the Nicaragua Canal, and are in favor of the proposition that it shall be built by the muscles, the brains, and the money of the United States, and that it shall be controlled by the Government or by the people of the United States.

I have been impressed by the fact that distinguished civilians such as my colleagues on the committee who presented the minority report have undertaken to put their constitutional opinions in the scale against those of chief justices of the Supreme Court, and that those same civilians, whose duties as members of this body are necessarily exacting and onerous and necessarily prevent them from a study of military tactics and of naval warfare, that these same gentlemen, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], place their opinions upon a question of military strategy in opposition to the opinions of the highest naval and military authorities, against the opinions of Mahan, and of Schofield, and of Walker.

Mr. TAWNEY. And Melville.

Mr. PEARSON. And the whole line of them. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] who has just taken his seat concedes that all of the Army and Navy are in favor of the annexation of these islands. But he suggests that it is owing to the fact that they are men of war and aggressive in their disposition, and that it has been their policy in the past to take everything in sight and hold everything they get.

In a matter of this sort, without undertaking to disparage the ability and learning of my colleagues upon the question of constitutionality, I shall venture to take my position with Chief Justice Marshall and with Chief Justice Taney rather than with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE]. And upon the question of military strategy I shall accept the opinions of military and naval experts rather than the opinions of the gentlemen who have signed the minority report, following the maxim, Cuique in sua arte credendum.

The minority have given seven alleged reasons for opposition, but those can be reduced without injustice to two, and they are the two which have already been mentioned. As the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has said, I do not believe that the possession of these islands necessarily inaugurates a policy of colonial aggrandizement, or imperial acquisition, or whatever the favorite expression may be. I believe that the annexation of those islands is a present necessity for the successful prosecution of this war—a necessity in order that we may hold up the hands of the gallant Dewey. For that reason I stand here to-day and give the measure my support.

I am not sure what is to be the disposition of the Philippine Islands. That necessarily brings up the consideration of other matters. But I want to ask, is there a man in this body who will go back to his people and advocate the doctrine which was advanced the other day by a distinguished publicist from New York, Mr. Coudert, who regrets that Dewey's exploit had forced a change of policy, and who suggests that Dewey should bombard and break down those forts, spike their guns, pull up his anchors, and come home? If there is a man here who is willing to join in that ignoble sentiment, in that pusillanimous recognition of Dewey's magnificent deed, I should like to see him. [Applause.]

If there is a man here who would dare go back to a patriotic and bold constituency and advocate such a policy as that, I should like to see him rise in his place. I do not hesitate to say, and I am glad to say, that in the country from which I come every man—Republican, Democrat, and Populist—not only applauds that act, but is unanimous in the belief and determination that we should hold those islands; that we should capture and hold Puerto Rico; that we should capture and hold the Canaries; that we should demand ample indemnity from Spain for the frightful cost of this war.

Mr. BALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman can reserve his question until later. I shall answer it gladly then.

Mr. BALL. It is right on that point.

Mr. PEARSON. I am but following the example set by all the gentlemen who have preceded me in asking that interrogatories be deferred to the end.

Mr. Speaker, not only the future of the Philippines but a number of other questions are involved in the consideration of this matter. I shall take the liberty, at the risk of being a little tedious, of referring to some of the results of the Chinese-Japanese war, not only as an indication of the present conditions in the far East but as foreshadowing probable future conditions.

It is well known to this body and to the world that Russia is now engaged in a tremendous work of internal improvement; that she is building what is known as the trans-Siberian railway, a work of enormous importance, to cost four times as much as it would cost to build the Nicaragua Canal. The contracts call for the completion of this great railway in 1905.

Strange to say, the eastern terminus of this great railway is not upon Russian soil, but, as the result of what a Russian diplomatist called "persuasion," it is at Port Arthur, which was ceded to Russia by China for the purpose at the end of the hostilities between Japan and China.

Thus Russia acquires on the eastern terminus of that road a harbor free from ice the year round, which must necessarily be a great center of trade and a great emporium in the future. Recognizing that Russia had taken from China a very important port, which Japan had coveted for herself and had looked upon as her legitimate prize, Great Britain, with her traditional desire for territory, then concludes that she will take a piece for herself, and she bases her claim upon the following statement of fact, which I take from Whitaker:

China having surrendered to France by a treaty concluded in 1895 certain territories which she had promised not to cede without having previously obtained the consent of Great Britain, Lord Salisbury insisted upon reparation being made for this breach of the convention of 1894. This was done by agreement signed June 5, 1897. China now cedes the Shan state of Kokang and grants free intercourse between Burmah and Yunnan, the opening of the Sikiang or West River as far as Wuchau, 160 miles above Canton, and the appointment of consular agents in other towns, etc.

And we find, Mr. Speaker, that Germany, looking upon the complaisant disposition of the ancient Chinese Government, has the good fortune to have two German missionaries massacred at Yen Chofu; and Germany, in consideration of the death of these religious enthusiasts, finds it is impossible for her national pride to be satisfied without taking this harbor for herself at the entrance of the Gulf of Pi-chi-li and three important forts, along with divers and sundry rights, privileges, and easements; and it would be fair to assume, if China is willing thus to give away her territory, that she is on the verge of dismemberment; and if she allows Russia not only to take Port Arthur, but allows her to build the Siberian Railroad 900 miles through ancient Manchuria, and not only that, but gives Russia the right to "exploit" (this is the word used) all the mineral wealth of that vast region; if she allows the steady advance of Russia like that of a glacier, which moves constantly but imperceptibly at first, and then faster and faster with the energy of liberated force, that descent of the Russians upon the Chinese Empire, after passing the Great Wall, will still be like the glacier after it has broken the barriers and obstacles that fettered and impeded its movement—the descent, at first imperceptible, in the end becomes irresistible and furious, and this means the disintegration of that Empire.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure I shall not be criticised for departing too far from the line of this discussion if I undertake to give my interpretation of the fourth resolution, which was adopted by Congress on the 19th of April. Opportunity was not allowed then for discussion in this House, and there was no desire, because expedition was what we wanted. I voted for this most cheerfully. It is possible that the world may misunderstand our motives and purposes. One of the best results of the present debate will be the expression of the opinions of members on the motives that have inspired their course on these war measures. We need not dwell on the arguments in favor of Hawaiian annexation, because these arguments are so strong that a majority of 40 to 60 is already assured. I shall take the liberty to address myself for a moment to the fourth resolution, which is in these words:

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

I indorse that, and yet without following the gentleman from Missouri in his discussion of what is understood by "manifest destiny." I see nothing in that which permits or precludes or estops the Government of the United States, say ten years from now or twenty years from now, from considering the question of annexation if proposed by the Republic of Cuba as an equal dealing with an equal. I would oppose and give my vote against any such annexation, at this time or at any time, until the people of that island have formed a stable government of their own and shall have shown that they are fitted to exercise the duties of citizenship, and they have taken their rank amongst the states of the world.

The question will be presented here in the future, and I venture to believe that it will be considered as an independent and open question, and not forestalled by anything that has been said and nothing that can be legitimately inferred from the terms and meaning of this resolution. No nobler sentiment has so far been uttered or written in this war than that expressed by the crew of the Merrimac when they refused to sail into Santiago Harbor under the Spanish flag and to let the American ships pursue them and discharge blank cartridges. These brave men said, "No; we would rather die under the Stars and Stripes than fight under false colors." [Applause.]

That is my sentiment here. And I think that in all these matters it is better, it is fairer, to be candid and to be bold, rather than to have any misconstruction as to the motives which have impelled us to take this action in the past. I do not hesitate to say, speaking for myself, and I feel quite sure I can speak for my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] who is not just now in his seat, that in all that exciting agitation which finally terminated in the passage of this resolution by an almost unanimous vote of this body, we stood side by side and we fought morning, noon, and night, for ten days and nights, in order that that word "independent" might be incorporated in the resolution.

The motive, of course, which first prompted our action was sympathy for these reconcentrados, and yet that feeling of pity or of sympathy was not the great driving, the great propelling force; the real and irresistible force was a feeling of vengeance. I do not hesitate to avow it.

When our ship was sunk in the foul harbor of Havana, and when we waited patiently for investigation by a court of our own, and when the judgment of that court was confirmed by our physical success, and when it was shown to us that the Spaniards had not only slaughtered our men but had slandered the living as well as the dead, and that there was a witness, dumb it is true, but unanswerable, the keel from the bottom of the Maine thrown up through the upper timbers of the ship, standing 4 feet above the water and 34 feet from where it belonged, standing there as a witness before the world and before God in heaven that the Spaniards had added to the crime of murder the insolence of lying, then I wanted to fight. I do not hesitate to proclaim it here. Then every man in the Navy wanted to fight, and every man in the Army wanted to fight.

I felt, along with others, that in the contemplation of that awful crime words could not tell our grief, money could not measure our loss, gold could not pay for our dead. The only punishment for such a crime, a crime without a name and without a parallel, the only retribution, the only expiation, the only compensation, it seemed to me, should be to declare that the loss of our ship shall mean the loss of Spanish sovereignty; the death of our men shall mean the birth of a new republic; that Spain shall be banished from the hemisphere which she has discovered and disgraced; that her army shall be driven from that fair island which it has plundered and laid waste; that her flag of gold and blood shall be torn down from the blue sky which it has polluted and in its place shall set the bright single star that glitters in the flag of free Cuba [applause], and that the morning star that heralds the dawn of the twentieth century announces the advent of the twentieth American Republic. Only such a penalty could fit such a crime. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, those of us who have had scruples in regard to a foreign policy, or fear a departure from our ancient policy, I am sure will recognize the fact that here, at the end of the nineteenth century, we have reached a new stage of national growth. I trust the House will bear with me if I refer briefly to the three periods which preceded.

Every argument made here against the annexation of Hawaii was made against Jefferson's purchase of Louisiana Territory in 1803, and every argument which has been made here in this debate was made against the annexation of Texas in 1845; and yet, gentlemen of the opposition, you will admit that after the acquisition of Louisiana by the wise act of Jefferson began a growth, a distinct growth, an increase in population and in wealth, and our people, who had conquered their independence of Great Britain when they were simply scattered settlements along the Atlantic seaboard, began after that purchase to climb over the Alleghenies and the Blue Ridge and settle in the rich valleys of the Mississippi.

That period of progress extended to the acquisition of Texas, against which the same argument was then made which we heard Saturday and to-day. Then came the Mexican war, and with it the acquisition of California. Then our people began to climb over the Rockies and the Sierra Nevadas. Everything was stopped and paralyzed by the civil war, but, fortunately for this country, while that war for a time arrested our progress, it settled two great questions which had perplexed our forefathers and disturbed their children and the country continually up to 1860.

Let me say to these gentlemen who are now making their opposition to this measure that a great many men from our section honestly opposed the abolition of slavery, honestly opposed such a change of policy, honestly believed in the right of secession. Yet what do we see to-day? There is not a man in this House, not an intelligent man in the country, certainly not an intelligent man in the Southern States, who does not accept the results of that civil war, who does not rejoice that the question of secession was forever settled and settled as it was, and that slavery was abolished; that instead of having two governments and two flags—two governments lying side by side with hostile laws and conflicting interests—we have one Government, one flag, one universal freedom, one united brotherhood, one common and splendid destiny. [Applause.]

We rejoice in this; and not only that, we rejoice in the opportunity which has been given us to prove that we are willing to risk our lives in attestation of our loyalty to the flag. No more inspiring spectacle has been seen by the American people than we witness to-day. "Fighting Joe" WHEELER has donned the blue uniform of a major-general of the United States, and he says very pleasantly that he feels as if he had simply been on a long furlough.

Fitzhugh Lee has called to his side the grandson of Ulysses S. Grant to fight side by side with him for the same cause and under the same flag. What shall we say of the temerity of a nation that will dare to confront both a Grant and a Lee fighting for the same noble cause? The Kearsarge and the Alabama, that fought each other in 1864, are afloat again in 1898 as vessels of a united Government. Each ship has been made anew from turret to keel; but under the same old names and under the same old flag, instead of fighting each other they are now prepared to hurl their red shot and shell into the haughty and treacherous Spaniard. And what shall we say of a nation that fails to recognize the inevitable result of an opposition such as this Congress and this people have determined upon in the prosecution of this war?

If Spain were wise, she would comply with the demands which we made upon her in the resolutions referred to; and perhaps she might save something out of the wreck. If she declines, nothing but inevitable ruin stares her in the face. Every day of delay adds millions of war expenditures. Every day of delay adds to the certain humiliation which is to come to her. Every day of delay adds to the completeness of the ruin which awaits her.

I venture the prediction that after we have driven these Spaniards from Cuba and from Puerto Rico, if Spain refuses to pay indemnity for the frightful cost entailed upon us, our Navy will go straight to Cadiz, will take every seaport on the Bay of Biscay and on the Atlantic and on the Mediterranean. With Barcelona, Valencia, Malaga, and Cadiz in our possession, what a spectacle will Spain present before the civilized world! There can be no question, Mr. Speaker, as to the ultimate result. We have more men and better men; we have more ships and better ships; we have more guns and better guns; and I trust I shall not be considered as making any political reference when I say we have more money and better money.

Mr. SIMPSON. We have more bonds and better bonds!

Mr. PEARSON. We have not so many bonds, but they are better bonds. The bonds we are about to issue will go at par and will be bought up eagerly by a patriotic American people. Let me say to the Populist gentleman who interrupted me, it is a god-send for us that we have men who are willing to recognize an emergency such as war and who, though they may be opposed to the issue of bonds in time of peace, have at least the patriotism to come up in time of war and say, "We will make every provision necessary for the comfort and maintenance and success of our Army." [Applause.]

The bonds which we may issue for the carrying on of this war have no terror for me. I am here to vote for bonds to any extent that may be necessary. If $400,000,000 are not enough, I would vote for $1,000,000,000 in order to insure the successful prosecution of this war. [Applause.] Spain is trying to sell her bonds in vain at 33 cents on the dollar. The United States has no difficulty in selling hers at $1.20 and $1.22, and I trust gentlemen will not understand that there is any politics in my remark when I say that that is 18 per cent more than they were worth four years ago. And that gold reserve which was flowing out of our Treasury, causing us so much uneasiness four years ago, now amounts to $120,000,000 more than we had at that time.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I voice the sentiment of the average American when I say we are in favor of making ample provision for our soldiers and our sailors, that they may have good clothes, that they may have good food, that they may have all necessary weapons and the best weapons, that they may have their pay regularly on the first day of every month, and that every dollar of their pay may be in the best money of the world—that every dollar shall contain 100 cents. [Loud applause.] Spain has followed the example of some bad advisers. Spain has dared to issue fiat money. Spain has no credit. Thank God, the credit of the United States is made good and will be kept good so long as the people sustain the Administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. So long as the Republican party are in power.

Mr. PEARSON. I was about to say that, but thought I would not.

Mr. Speaker, the interruption across the aisle prevented me from reaching the last stage of development. I had recounted only two, and I had promised three. After the war was settled as it was, and we were no longer disturbed by those old questions, then came a period of growth and development in this country, the greatest that has ever been known in the history of the world from the time of the first organized government among men.

Our people had reached the Pacific shores. They had then begun to build the connecting lines of railway, first the Union and Central Pacific, then the Northern Pacific, then the Southern Pacific, combining the sections together; and we have felt that not only in the sense of homogeneity here, but in the tremendous internal development. In the building of railroads this country advanced in the period between 1865 to 1898, building more than all the rest of the world put together; and in the application of the forces of steam and electricity to human uses and human comforts there never has been such a period as that from 1865 to 1898 in the United States of America.

I do not undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that all of our waste places have been filled, that all our frontier has been occupied, because there may be good lands yet to be occupied and to be cultivated. But I need not enumerate the number of particulars in which this phenomenal increase and development was made, in everything excepting one, and I think that the result of this war will have a tendency to draw our attention to that. I mean the loss in the merchant marine. It is a fact that our merchant marine was not only relatively but absolutely greater forty years ago than it is to-day. Still we rank second to Great Britain. With the development which is sure to follow the building of the Nicaragua Canal and the activity in the Pacific and in eastern Asia, I feel satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that there will come a tremendous growth in our commercial marine and in those profits of legitimate commerce which have made Great Britain what she is.

I shall be pardoned if I undertake to contrast for a moment the policy which has made Great Britain what she is and the policy which has reduced Spain to what she is. Macaulay says whoever wishes to study the morbid anatomy of nations, whoever wishes to understand how a great state can be made feeble and wretched, should study the history of Spain. "The causes of Spain's decay may all be summed up in one cause, and that is bad government."

If we will contrast the magnificent empire which Charles V left to Philip II with the poor, pitiful, wasted condition of Spain to-day, and, on the other hand, consider what was the empire of Great Britain in the time of Elizabeth and what it is to-day, in the time of Victoria; if we will contrast the growth of Prussia, starting with the little Marquisate of Brandenburg and growing into the Kingdom of Prussia, expanding into the Empire of Germany, until the old Kaiser Wilhelm was crowned in the palace of Versailles; if we will come down further and contrast the government of the Island of Cuba during one hundred years of oppression, cruelty, bloodshed, and revolution, while side by side under an English and Anglo-Saxon and honest form of administration we find in Jamaica a hundred years of law and order and of peace and of progress, we are obliged to conclude, Mr. Speaker, that the fault is not in the climate, the fault is not in the soil; it is the difference in the genius of the governing races, a difference as marked, as distinct, as that which characterizes the tough old Irish oak in Westminster Hall as compared with the brittle and brilliant arabesques in the Cathedral of Seville. [Applause.]

I am glad that I belong to that Anglo-Saxon race. I am glad that I am one of the descendants of those savages that swept from the north and overran the Roman Empire, and I make bold to declare that the nations that rule the world to-day and will rule it in the future are the descendants of those same savages that wandered in the unbroken forests of Britain, of Gaul, and of Germany.

I have nothing to say in disparagement of the Latin races, but the results of history show that that race can not keep pace with the Anglo-Saxon in the march of progress and that the four Governments that are ruling now and will rule this world are Russia, Germany, Great Britain, and the United States of America. And with the rule must come to the earth a higher standard of civilization and higher respect for honest and clean administration and a greater reverence for true religion.

And, Mr. Speaker, I close with the thought that the flag which is the emblem of our Government, and which floats now from one end of this country to the other, in every breeze, thick as the blossoms of May, will never again wave its folds over scenes of sectional hate or fratricidal strife, but everywhere, over the land and over the sea, it will stand as the emblem of perfect and indestructible unity at home and of defiant and invincible strength abroad. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we are gravely told that the proposition presented by the resolution for the annexation of Hawaii is the commencement of a new policy of the United States for the acquisition of colonial territory. It is said that following this will come the annexation of the Philippine Islands, Cuba, and Puerto Rico, and that finally the nation will so extend her boundaries that it will fall by reason of the fact that so many diverse nationalities are brought under the flag that our republican form of government can not possibly be maintained. All this sounds like an echo from the past.

The prophets of evil who so loudly declaim upon the disasters and woes which are to come if we pass these resolutions are but the lineal successors of those who told the people of this country in former years, when annexations of territory were being discussed, that evil and destruction must surely follow. Men even stood up and solemnly declared that any such annexation as that of Florida or Louisiana would be sufficient cause for severance of the bonds of union between the States.

It would be profitable, if time would permit, to call to mind in detail the various objections that have been urged in the years past to each and every proposition of annexation which has been before the American people. Not one argument has been advanced in the course of this debate against the annexation of Hawaii that was not made when former annexations of territory were under consideration. Grave statesmen then, as now, insisted that the boundaries of the United States should not be extended, that compactness of territory was necessary, that it would not do to annex any territory where the inhabitants were not homogeneous and suited to American citizenship, that to commence the extension of our boundaries meant aggrandizement and would surely weaken the bonds of our Union.

A careful perusal of the history of the past will soon satisfy anyone that in the opposition to this resolution nothing new has been developed. To assert and reassert that the action proposed is a departure from the traditions of the fathers is no argument. Look, if you please, at the small territory covered originally by the thirteen colonies and compare it with the vast extent of territory now embraced within the boundaries of the United States. Remember that the original small territory has grown to the present vast expanse by no other means whatever than annexation.

Remember that Florida was annexed by purchase from Spain; that Louisiana, with the great Northwest, was secured in like manner from France; that a vast expanse of territory came to us by conquest from Mexico; that Texas was admitted into the sisterhood of States after she had secured her independence from Mexico; that icebound Alaska was ceded to us by Russia, and that in each and every case the people of the United States were told that it was unconstitutional and would prove ruinous to the country.

It has been well said that our territory to-day is smaller in comparison with the population than it was a half century ago. The territory now proposed to be annexed by these resolutions is indeed very small in extent, but its position makes it very important to the United States. So important has it always been considered, from the time it was first brought to the attention of the American people, more than half a century ago, that at no time since then has it been thought possible that this nation would allow these islands to drift into the hands of any foreign nation.

It is remarkable as well as interesting that a close study of the history of the last fifty years will not disclose a single line or a single word from any of the Presidents of the United States or the Secretaries of State upon this subject, that looks for one moment with favor upon the idea that any foreign nation should be allowed to control these islands in the Pacific Ocean, which we now propose to annex, and yet, Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate it has been asserted over and over again that this policy is a new one, and that it is but the commencement of a proposed colonial policy. Gentlemen who make these statements have closed their eyes to the history of their country.

Allow me to call your attention to some of the expressions of Presidents and their Secretaries of State. In 1842 Daniel Webster, as Secretary of State under President Tyler, said:

The United States * * * are more interested in the fate of the islands and of their Government than any other nation can be, and this consideration induces the President to be quite willing to declare, as the sense of the Government of the United States, that the Government of the Sandwich Islands ought to be respected; that no power ought either to take possession of the islands as a conquest or for the purpose of colonization, and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing Government, or any exclusive privileges or preferences in matters of commerce.

In 1843 Secretary of State Legaré, in a dispatch to Edward Everett, minister at London, said:

It is well known that * * * we have no wish to plant or to acquire colonies abroad. Yet there is something so entirely peculiar in the relations between this little commonwealth, Hawaii, and ourselves that we might even feel justified, consistently with our own principles, in interfering by force to prevent its falling into the hands of one of the great powers of Europe.

In 1843 James Buchanan, in a dispatch to our minister at Honolulu, said:

We ardently desire that the Hawaiian Islands may maintain their independence. It would be highly injurious to our interests if, tempted by their weakness, they should be seized by Great Britain or France; more especially so since our recent acquisitions from Mexico on the Pacific Ocean.

In 1850 Secretary of State Clayton, in a dispatch to our minister at Paris, said:

If, however, in your judgment it should be warranted by circumstances, you may take a proper opportunity to intimate to the minister for foreign affairs of France that the situation of the Sandwich Islands, in respect to our possessions on the Pacific, and the bonds commercial and of other descriptions between them and the United States are such that we could never, with indifference, allow them to pass under the dominion or exclusive control of any other power.

In 1854 Secretary of State Marcy, in his special instructions to our minister at Honolulu, said:

In your general instructions you were furnished with the views of this Government in regard to any change in the political affairs of the Sandwich Islands. The President was aware, when those instructions were prepared, that the question of transferring the sovereignty of those islands to the United States had been raised and favorably received by many influential individuals residing therein. It was foreseen that at some period, not far distant, such a change would take place, and that the Hawaiian Islands would come under the protectorate of or be transferred to some foreign power.

You were informed that it was not the policy of the United States to accelerate such a change; but if, in the course of events, it became unavoidable, this Government would much prefer to acquire the sovereignty of these islands for the United States rather than to see it transferred to any other power. If any foreign connection is to be formed, the geographical position of these islands indicates that it should be with us. Our commerce with them far exceeds that of all other countries; our citizens are embarked in the most important business concerns of that country, and some of them hold important public positions. In view of the large American interests there established and the intimate commercial relations existing at this time, it might be well regarded as the duty of this Government to prevent these islands from becoming the appendage of any other foreign power.

Allow me to call the attention of gentlemen who claim that the annexation of Hawaii is a new proposition to the words of Secretary Marcy in these instructions: He clearly sets out that the Hawaiian Islands can not long remain a separate power and that the United States would much prefer to annex them, rather than to see them transferred to any other power. This statement was gravely made in an official communication forty-four years ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will it disturb my friend to ask him one question?

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I think not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you know the purpose William L. Marcy had in the annexation of the Sandwich Islands was to increase the slave territory of the United States? Was not that the whole thing they were after?

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I think that was not the whole thing they wanted, but that he contemplated if they were annexed they would become slave territory.

But, Mr. Speaker, the annexation of slave territory to the United States is no longer a bugaboo to the people of this country. That question is settled, settled by the war, now more than a quarter of a century past. Moreover, if Mr. Marcy's opinion was the only one favoring annexation there would be some force in the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri; but let us look further and see what others have said on the subject. After the close of the civil war, and slavery had been abolished, that great Secretary of State, William H. Seward, in a communication to our minister at Honolulu, said:

Second. You will be governed in all your proceedings by a proper respect and courtesy to the Government and people of the Sandwich Islands; but it is proper that you should know, for your own information, that a lawful and peaceful annexation of the islands to the United States, with the consent of the people of the Sandwich Islands, is deemed desirable by this Government; and that if the policy of annexation should really conflict with the policy of reciprocity, annexation is in every case to be preferred.

In 1888, during the first Democratic Administration after the close of the war, Thomas F. Bayard, then Secretary of State, said in referring to the reciprocity treaty negotiated in 1875:

It was my idea that the policy originating in the Fish treaty of the Grant Administration in 1875 should be permitted to work out its proper results.

The obvious course was to wait quietly and patiently and let the islands all up with American planters and American industries until they should be wholly identified in business interests and political sympathies with the United States. It was simply a matter of waiting until the apple should ripen and fall.

Mr. Speaker, I might give many more quotations of the same character, but I will content myself with these, which cover more than half a century, and show that the Secretaries of State during all that time have advocated and looked forward to the annexation of these islands. And now, Mr. Speaker, in the language of Mr. Bayard, "the apple has ripened and has fallen," and the American people propose to take it up and put it in the basket.

Mr. GAINES. We do not want sour apples.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. No; we do not want sour apples, nor do the American people want that disposition that will make those apples sour whether sweet or not.

What are the conditions to-day? Has the apple ripened, has it fallen, and is it ready to be taken up and put into the American basket? The American policy regarding Hawaii has always been that it should not be allowed to pass under the control of a foreign power, and that in good time it should become a part of American territory.

The total population of the islands, according to the census of 1896, is 109,020, distributed as follows:

Native Hawaiians.....	31,000
Japanese.....	24,400
Portuguese.....	15,100
Chinese.....	21,600
Part Hawaiian and part foreign blood.....	8,400
Americans.....	3,000
British.....	2,200
German.....	1,400
Norwegian and French.....	479
All other nationalities.....	1,055

The proportion of the various kinds of population is as follows:

	Per cent.
Native Hawaiian.....	29
Japanese.....	23
Chinese.....	20
Americans, and Europeans by birth or descent.....	22
Mixed blood.....	8

Much has been said about the Chinese and Japanese portion of the population, but it seems to me that what has been stated on that subject as an argument against the annexation of Hawaii is strong argument in favor of this annexation. It does not follow because there is a large amount of cheap labor in Hawaii, represented by the Japanese and Chinese, that its annexation to the United States will increase or continue this kind of labor upon the islands, or that any of this cheap labor will be transferred to any other United States territory. Upon the contrary, the policy of the United States is firmly fixed upon the question of cheap Mongolian labor.

Under the new treaty with Japan, commencing with the year 1899, the United States will have the right to control importation of cheap Japanese labor, and we have already solved the question, so far as the Chinese are concerned. It is evident, therefore, that by a strict enforcement of United States laws against Chinese and Japanese immigration into the Sandwich Islands it will be but a few years until the Japanese and Chinese population now in the islands will be decreased, and they will no longer be an important factor upon the islands.

Of the Portuguese population, about one-half have been born on the islands and have been educated in the English language under American influences, and by those who have visited the islands we are told that these people are very industrious and do not form an undesirable portion of the population. They readily acquire American habits, understand American institutions, and have availed themselves of the opportunities to educate their children in American schools. So strong has been the American influence in the islands that their schools have been patterned after the systems of the States, in which the English language is taught and learned by all.

Americans in the islands own nearly all the property and have practically made them an American community. The population is much more favorable to American institutions than was the population of Florida when it became a part of the United States territory, and when Louisiana was annexed to the United States her population was not nearly so suited for American citizenship as to-day are the people of the Islands of Hawaii. But we are told that these islands are so far from our shores that they can not be made a part of the country without requiring us to go to great expense in protecting them.

Mr. Speaker, distance is no longer measured by miles, but by the time required to travel it. Measured in this way, Hawaii to-day is nearer to us than was California when we acquired that territory, and much nearer than Alaska when Russia ceded it to us. It is only about six days' travel by ordinary steamer from our western coast, and nearly twice as far to the shores of any other nation. Hawaii is indeed geographically a part of the United States. Her position only about one-third of the way across the great Pacific makes her a natural outpost for our western coast. This was the controlling reason that has led all of our statesmen in recent years past to the one conclusion that no foreign nation should ever be allowed to occupy the Hawaiian Islands.

From a military and naval point of view these islands are necessary to the protection of our western coast. All of our military and naval authorities have uniformly advocated the acquisition of these islands. A careful examination of their utterances from time to time will disclose that not a single one of them has ever held the view that the islands ought not to become a part of the United States. I shall not take up the time of the House in quoting from the various opinions of our naval and military men, but will content myself with calling attention to the opinions of General Schofield, as expressed in a letter written last January to Senator MORGAN, upon this subject. It so clearly states the situation that I beg to read it all as a part of my remarks:

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA., January 15, 1898.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of January 9, I do not hesitate to write you without reserve in respect to my views upon the pending question of annexation of the Hawaiian Islands.

From the time, twenty-five years ago, when I made a personal examination for the purpose of ascertaining the value of those islands to this country for military and naval purposes, I have always regarded ultimate annexation of the islands to this country as a public necessity. But the time when this should be accomplished had to depend on natural political development. In the meantime our national interests should be secured by the exclusive right to occupy, improve, and fortify Pearl River Harbor so as to insure our possession of that harbor in time of war.

To illustrate my views on this subject, I have likened that harbor to a commanding position in front of a defensive line which an army in the field is compelled to occupy. The army must occupy that advanced position and hold it at whatever cost, or else the enemy will occupy it with his artillery and thus dominate the main line. If we do not occupy and fortify Pearl River Harbor, our enemy will occupy it as a base from which to conduct operations against our Pacific coast and the isthmian canal, which must of course in due time be constructed and controlled by this country. The possession of such a base at a convenient distance from our Pacific coast would be a great temptation to an unfriendly nation to undertake hostile operations against us.

One of the greatest advantages of Pearl River Harbor to us consists in the fact that no navy would be required to defend it. It is a deep, land-locked arm of the sea, easily defended by fortifications placed near its mouth, with its anchorage beyond the reach of guns from the ocean. Cruisers or other war ships which might be overpowered at sea, as well as merchant vessels, would find there behind the land defenses absolute security against a naval attack. A moderate garrison of regular troops, with the militia on the island, would give sufficient protection against any landing parties from a hostile fleet. Of course an army on transports, supported by a powerful fleet, could land and capture the place, but that would be an expensive operation, one much less likely to be undertaken than the occupation of an undefended harbor, as a necessary preliminary to an attack on our coast or upon our commerce.

The value of such a place of refuge and of supplies for our merchant marine and our cruisers in time of war can hardly be overestimated, yet the greatest value to us of that wonderful harbor consists in the fact that its possession and adequate defense by us prevents the possibility of an enemy using it against us.

So far as I know, the leading statesmen, no less than the military and naval authorities of this country, have always been in accord on this subject. While it has not been proposed to interfere with the continued occupation by foreign nations of their military strongholds in this hemisphere, it has been publicly and emphatically declared that none of those strongholds shall ever be allowed to pass into the possession of any other nation whose interests might be antagonistic to ours. Now for the first time the occasion has arisen to carry into effect our long-declared national policy. A little State like Hawaii can not stand alone among the great nations, all of whom covet her incomparable harbor. She must have the protection of this country or some other great nation. But a protectorate without sovereignty is the last thing this country could afford to assume. In the absence of authority to regulate and control the intercourse between the islands and other countries controversies must arise which would lead to war or to the loss of our invaluable military possession in the islands. No halfway measures will suffice. We must accept the islands and hold and govern them or else let some other great nation do it. To fail now to carry into effect our own great national policy upon the first occasion offered to us would, in my judgment, be one of those blunders which are worse than crimes.

To my mind what may be regarded perhaps as the sentimental aspect of the question is entitled to consideration. A colony of intelligent, virtuous, and patriotic Americans have rescued a country from barbarism and raised it to a high state of civilization and prosperity, until in the natural course of events the government of that country has fallen entirely into their hands. They now ask the privilege of adding that country to their own native land, of returning with their new possessions to the parental fold. Can they be turned away to seek a home among strangers? Not without violating one of the most sacred laws of nature and incurring the penalty which must, sooner or later, necessarily follow.

I am, dear Senator, with great respect, sincerely yours,

J. M. SCHOFIELD.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

I can add nothing to the convincing argument presented in this letter.

Criticism has been offered from time to time in this debate to the effect that this is an attempt to annex the Hawaiian Islands under the pretense of a war measure. Mr. Speaker, the passage of these resolutions is not a war measure. As I have already shown, for more than half a century this nation has held that we are more interested in the Hawaiian Islands than any other nation, that they must ultimately become a part of the United States.

Twenty-five years ago General Schofield examined the islands with a view to determine their usefulness from a naval and military point of view. Three times treaties have been negotiated for the annexation of the islands, first in 1854, next in 1893, and last in 1897. At the time each of these three treaties was negotiated no idea of the war with Spain entered into the minds of the contracting parties. Mr. Speaker, the only bearing which the present war has upon the question is that it is like a great searchlight which has been turned upon the question and brought it more clearly to the attention of the American people.

As soon as it was understood that Admiral Dewey was to attack the Spanish fleet at Manila every American could but ask the question: "How can we succor him in case of defeat, or how can we reinforce him in the event of victory?" Anticipating the needs of the hour, the Government of the United States piled up coal at Honolulu for the use of our vessels, and to-day, when we are sending reinforcements to Dewey, not one of our vessels could sail from San Francisco to Manila without stopping at Honolulu to take on additional coal. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that to-day Hawaii were hostile to us, or even neutral, with no right within her harbors, how could we succor our brave seamen in Manila Bay?

But we are told that Pearl Harbor now belongs to this nation and that there is nothing else on the island that we need for naval purposes. Without stopping to discuss this question, I beg to call attention to one controlling fact so clearly set forth in the testimony of General Schofield when he appeared before our Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that is that even if we had Pearl Harbor, in case of hostilities, with the Government of the islands unfriendly, it would be easy to land a military force and capture the harbor from within; but if the islands are in our possession, a small force of soldiers in addition to the fortifications at the mouth of the harbor would enable us to hold it against all comers.

Pearl Harbor, landlocked as it is, fortified at its entrance and protected by our possession of the islands themselves, would give to our Navy, in time of war, absolute security from a navy even of superior strength. Looking at it from the enemy's point of view, the islands are of much greater importance to us. As ships are now constructed, no nation from the East can send its ships across the Pacific and attack our western coast without having a base of supplies and a place from which to operate nearer to our shores. With Hawaii in our possession and well fortified, the navy of a possible Eastern foe would be practically powerless to make a successful attack upon our western coast.

The minority of the committee in the resolutions which they present practically concede that it is necessary that no foreign power should gain control of the Islands of Hawaii, but in the place of annexation they recommend a resolution declaring that the islands shall remain a separate power. Mr. Speaker, the time for such declarations as this is past. The question that confronts the American people to-day is a plain, simple one. If Hawaii is ever to be annexed to the United States, it must be done now; otherwise it is sure to pass under the control of the Japanese. To-day nothing prevents this but the fact that the Government of Hawaii has announced its desire and intention to have the islands annexed to the United States.

If annexed, the United States will settle all questions raised by them, and there need be no fear of the result. Refuse to annex them, and the weak little Republic of Hawaii can not hope to stand out against the demands of Japan that her people shall become citizens and have a right to vote. Once given the right to vote, it does not take a prophet to tell what will be the result. Already there are nearly 25,000 Japanese in the islands. Nearly all of these are men, strong, courageous, as loyal to their nationality as Americans are to theirs. What good, Mr. Speaker, would come of a resolution passed by Congress to the effect that the Hawaiian Government should remain a separate power, if that Government passed entirely under the control of Japanese citizens? It might remain an independent Government, and yet, being controlled by the Japanese, would, for all purposes, be a part of the Japanese Empire.

Suppose that to-day, instead of being controlled by Americans, with American institutions and American inclinations, the islands were in the hands of the Japanese, and the Japanese were unfriendly to us in the war with Spain, how, under such circumstances—tell me, if you can—would we send ships with troops and supplies to aid Dewey in the far-off waters of Manila Bay? Nor is it an improbability, much less an impossibility, that the future may bring about such complications as will cause a war between this country and Japan herself. In case of such a war, will any one for a moment contend that it would be better for the Japanese to have control of the islands than for them to be a part of American territory? From such a base of operations, Japan would be so strong in naval warfare against us that our western coast would be at her mercy.

Mr. Speaker, I have not taken occasion to discuss the question raised that we have no constitutional right to annex these islands, nor will I take up the time of the House in discussing it. It must be perfectly evident to anyone that the right to extend its territory is inherent in any nation, and that it requires no special provision of the Constitution to enable us to annex additional territory. It is true this constitutional question has been raised over and over again in years past, and it is now gravely asserted in this debate that the annexation would be unconstitutional, but it is nevertheless no longer an open question.

Five times before this the question has been before the American people for decision; five times they have decided in favor of the right to annex territory, and five times have they extended the boundaries of the United States. It is too late for anyone to take an appeal from these decisions; they are settled law, and the question can no longer be raised. A discussion of the question at this time and hereafter may be interesting from a historical point of view, but it can not now be made nor will it ever again become a practical, living question before the American people.

Mr. Speaker, 2,100 miles out in the Pacific Ocean, to the west of San Francisco, lies this group of islands, so beautiful and so attractive that they have been properly designated the "pearls of the Pacific." Lying beneath the tropical sun, yet surrounded by ocean currents which bring the cool waters of the Northwest about them, rendering the climate so pleasant that it is not injurious to anyone and is admired by all; with soil productive far beyond the conception of our own people; with beautiful lakes and sparkling rivers, and with everything that goes to make them an earthly paradise, is it any wonder that these islands proved so attractive to Americans that they made them their home, and that they are now anxious that they should become a part of their native land?

Small though the American population is, yet strong and dominant, the islands are now practically within their control. With Americans owning a large portion of the property and leading in all matters of business and enterprise, it was but natural that the profligate monarchy should be followed by a republican government in the hands of the Americans upon the islands. Long years ago their influences were asserted under the old monarchies, and for decades of the past their power has been felt in everything that has been done upon the islands. American schools were established and have flourished, until to-day the schools of the island are as well managed and as prosperous as in any American community, and compare favorably with those of the grand old State of Pennsylvania, represented by my venerable friend [Mr. GROW].

Mr. Speaker, this gallant band of Americans who have thus gained control of these islands come to us now and make us a free offering of them as a part of our national domain. True Americans at heart, they have declined to declare the neutrality of the islands during our war with Spain, and to-day our American ships enter the harbor of Honolulu with the same freedom and with the same feeling of security as they could any harbor under the domination of our own Government. The request of these brave men must not be turned aside.

We want these islands because of their value from a naval and military point of view; we want them on account of the rich productiveness of the soil; we want them on account of the commercial advantages which they will bring to our country; we want them in order that no foreign power may use them as a base of operations against us in time of war; we want them because they are more contiguous to our territory than to that of any other nation; we want them because they are geographically a part of the United States; but, Mr. Speaker, we want them more than all on account of the true Americans who have made their homes upon the islands and now seek to present these islands as a free offering to their mother country. Let us pass these resolutions, secure Hawaii, add to our naval and military strength, extend our commerce, and bring back again into the family fold the people who have been away from us establishing a home in these delightful islands.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, in entering upon a discussion of this important question at the present time, we should not forget the situation that confronts us. Whatever may be said with regard to the ultimate policy of this Government toward the Hawaiian Islands or as to the importance of that people and that country in relation to our own, this is not the time to enter upon any final disposition of that question. We are now in the midst of a war the prosecution of which was entered upon for a certain purpose.

The resolutions that passed this House and the other branch of Congress declaring war against Spain committed this Government expressly to the sole policy of freedom, disclaiming any intention of an aggressive warfare. Cuba, almost a part of our own territory, the most important island south of us, would be, as a part of our own territory, a means of defense in time of war far more important than the Hawaiian Islands. Yet in order that the civilized world might know, as well as our own people, that we had entered upon this contest in the interest of humanity, in the interest of freedom, and not in a spirit of aggression, we declared that the sole purpose of this war was to relieve the starving and distressed people of Cuba and to extinguish the barbarity of Spanish rule in that island.

Our war resolutions explicitly stated that we entered on no war for conquest, and that we would not annex the Island of Cuba, but would give free government to her people. That was the declared purpose, and that only. For that purpose, and that purpose only, have we voted to supply the Army and the Navy of the United States. For that purpose, and that purpose only, have the American people sanctioned unanimously this war as being a holy war.

Why, sir, if it had been contended here when we were entering upon this contest that it was intended for aggression for the seizure of the Hawaiian Islands, the maintenance of our sovereignty in the China Sea, that it was intended to make alliances with other great governments in order to participate in the partition of China and to make aggressions in the Asiatic waters—meaning thereby not only $500,000,000 of interest-bearing debt, but probably four times that amount, meaning thereby not only increased taxation upon the people of this country to the extent of $150,000,000 annually for a temporary purpose, but a debt of at least $2,000,000,000 increased taxation for a purpose without limit and without termination—I doubt if this House or the Senate would ever have made a declaration of war under such conditions. And, sir, to bring forward this policy now and to urge this measure as a war measure is simply to write on the statute books of this country a falsification of the very declarations that we made in going to war.

A war measure! There is no Spanish fleet threatening the Hawaiian Islands. No one pretends that the possession of those islands is necessary now as a defense of our coasts. But, on the contrary, Mr. Speaker, we have assembled to-day at San Francisco a fleet ready to transport troops and supplies to the Philippine Islands; all of our war ships are practically leaving that coast and going to the defense of Dewey in the Philippine Islands because we need no defense on that coast.

If we had any use or shall have any need of a base for coal supplies and a harbor of refuge at Hawaii, we have all that now in the Sandwich Islands. By treaty we are in possession of Pearl Harbor, the only harbor on the Sandwich Islands that is suitable for this purpose. We have the sole sovereign control of this harbor, even to the exclusion of the Government of Hawaii. We now own and control a naval station on these islands. We need nothing more. Even admitting that there is or should be a necessity for a coaling station there, we have that as completely and as effectually as we could have it by owning the islands.

Coal has never been found on the Hawaiian Islands, and a coaling station there must be supplied by transporting coal to the islands and storing it in our station there—a station that by treaty we have the exclusive right to fortify and hold against the world, and Pearl Harbor is the only place on the whole coast of Hawaii where such a station is at all feasible. No other nation can get such a station on these islands, for there is no other practicable harbor there to possess.

Why undertake to deceive ourselves or deceive the world by the hypocritical cry that Hawaii is necessary now as a war measure? No intelligent man believes such a statement.

No, sir, we started out protesting against the system of colonization. We have from the beginning denounced the idea of colonization. We started out for the purpose of wresting one of Spain's colonies from her rule, because our Government is hostile to the idea of people being dominated as a colony. In vindication of our antagonism to colonization and our position in favor of freedom our flag was to be planted by our Army and Navy upon the soil of Cuba. Now, on the contrary, that same flag—as a "war measure," it is said—is to be taken and planted upon the Island of Hawaii without the consent of the people of that island. Such a policy is indefensible; and the plea which is put forward in excuse for it has no foundation in fact at the present time.

The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who addressed this House a short time ago, undertook to put himself right on this question by disclaiming any idea of pressing this policy of colonization into the China seas or interfering with European complications. But he ought to know that this movement for the annexation of Hawaii is simply an entering wedge for such a policy. If not, Mr. Speaker, why can we not wait until this war is over and the people can take this question into consideration without reference to any of the complications existing at the present time?

The fact is, the Government of Hawaii as now constituted—not the people of Hawaii—has been knocking for some years at our doors. During two Administrations, or during a period beginning at the close of one Administration and extending through the whole of another, that Government has been presenting itself here. But up to this hour, Mr. Speaker, there has been a steady refusal on the part of the Government of the United States to accept their treaty or their entreaties. In time of peace, when this question could be considered calmly and dispassionately, when no complications were involved, when no pressure could be made under militarism and military aggression, we have refused this offer.

But now, sir, taking advantage of a declaration of war and of a condition of hostilities with the bankrupt Government of Spain, under that pressure and in violation of the spirit in which the war was entered upon, a policy of aggression and a policy of territorial acquisition is urged. It will not do, Mr. Speaker. This Government, after having made its solemn declaration that this war was a war for humanity and for freedom, can not afford now to pervert it into a selfish policy of greed and oppression. It is dishonorable. It does not become a great nation like ours to perpetrate a deception upon its own people and upon others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as the Philippine Islands are concerned, I do not believe there is a gentleman on either side of this House who is not more than willing and anxious to make complete and perfect the victory so gallantly won by Dewey, the most notable, probably, in the annals of naval warfare. We will not abandon the Philippine Islands until we get ready and in our own good time. But, sir, we do not need the Hawaiian Islands to hold the Philippines.

The Philippine Islands were a part of the territory of Spain. Dewey and his fleet being in Chinese waters, and having no other place where they could go, for the purpose of inflicting a crushing defeat upon the enemy and securing a base of operations, went into the harbor and fought that battle and won that glorious victory. That was legitimate war upon the enemy against whom we had declared war, war in the interest of freedom, war in the very spirit of our resolutions. Being Spanish territory, legitimately acquired, we will hold those islands until this war is over, and that problem can be then solved.

Solved how? I may not stop here to argue that question, but there is only one true way to solve it. We can not sell the islands, because we have no right as a free people to undertake to sell a people or a part of a people we have conquered. They deserve the boon of liberty as much as do the people of Cuba; and if, in the providence of God, those islands are also freed and turned over to their own people for self-government as Cuba must be freed, it simply adds to our luster and does not detract from it.

But we can not honorably do anything else with those islands. We can not profitably hold them permanently, because the holding of them would involve us in all the diplomatic relations with European and Asiatic politics, against which entanglements we have from the beginning protested.

So far as Puerto Rico is concerned, I believe that it is the duty of this Government to drive Spain from that island and forever quit her dominion over it. Because we have begun a war against Spain, that is the Government which is proper to vanquish as far as possible in accomplishing our great purposes of liberty, and I say that the driving of the Spanish from the island of Puerto Rico is not only legitimate, but I believe it to be necessary for the peace and security of our country in the future.

Spain is a bad neighbor, but after we have extinguished the last authority of Spain in this hemisphere and practically established the Monroe doctrine, shall we abandon that policy and start upon the Asiatic seas, among Asiatic populations, in countries devoted to Asiatic civilization, unnecessary in peace, wholly unnecessary in war, and perpetrate the wrongs that will be perpetrated by the passing of these resolutions?

Why, gentlemen tell us that the Government of Hawaii favors this proposition. I use that word only as recognizing those having authority there—the representatives of a few thousand, probably three or four thousand among a hundred thousand—the white intelligent race ruling the Chinese, Japanese, and Portuguese, as the intelligent white Caucasian race will rule the inferior race wherever they are brought together. You gentlemen on that side who have undertaken to make issues here against some of the Southern States upon this proposition show where you stand to-day when you are willing to countenance the government of an island by a few white people at the expense of extreme domination over an inferior race. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Hawaii is 2,500 miles from San Francisco, the nearest important port on our seacoast. Hawaii has a population of pure and mixed natives, 89,504; Japanese, 25,407; Chinese, 21,616; Portuguese, 15,291, or a total population of 151,818 that may be denominated as an inferior race. A large portion of this population we have by treaty and statute undertaken to exclude from our shores because they are undesirable.

There are British residents on the island, 2,250; Germans, 1,432; Americans, 3,080. Of the Caucasian race, which dominates and controls, there are only 6,702.

Under the constitution of Hawaii no one can vote without swearing to support that constitution, and it so happens that this constitution provides for annexing the island to the United States. This constitution was forced upon the people of the island by a handful of Americans, and has disfranchised all the inhabitants of the island who will not swear that they will vote to surrender their native land to another government before they are permitted to vote. This may be called a free ballot, but it has the appearance of a ballot offered to the voter in one hand with the condition of his voting that he surrender his birthright, and if he refuses this condition a sword is held in the other hand to strike down the ballot and to disfranchise the voter. It is a Government thus organized that presents the treaty that we propose to accept by the resolutions pending before this House. I deny that the people of the island have been fairly consulted in this transaction. It is a scheme to force a robbery, pure and simple, that we are called upon to sanction and enforce.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BLAND. I have but thirty minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply desire to ask whether you know that the Senate of Hawaii which ratified the treaty is composed largely of native Hawaiians?

Mr. BLAND. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking of natives or foreigners. There are a few white natives. I am speaking of the population of that island, and especially the population to whom that island by nativity belongs. When the gentleman presses that question, it is an admission that he has disfranchised them by the wholesale, and the pretense that they are presenting this treaty here voluntarily is a fraud and a lie upon its face.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you not also know—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BLAND. I can not yield any further. I have not the time. The gentleman can speak in his own time.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact—

Mr. BLAND. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman, but I have only thirty minutes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not here to denounce the American people upon that island for their Americanism. I am here, so far as justice and right will permit it, to uphold them and to turn to them our support for whatever sympathy they have given us in this struggle. If they have violated any of the principles of neutrality, if they have subjected themselves to any claim of damages from Spain, this great Government of ours stands ready to foot the bill four times over, if necessary.

When we come to treat with Spain we may have a much larger bill of damages than Spain can possibly present to Hawaii. Gentlemen know, and the ruling powers in Hawaii know, that they are perfectly safe in any favors they give to this great Government. Not only that, but they know that in the future, as well as in the past, this Government intends that no hostile power shall ever dominate over those islands.

That has been our pledge and our policy from the beginning. The resolutions to be offered by us as a substitute for annexation provides that we shall forever guarantee independence to the Sandwich Islands. This is a mere pretext thrown in here under the war spirit to perpetrate upon the people of this country what I conceive to be a wrong; not so much now in the acquisition of Hawaii as in what it looks to in the future for the acquisition of territory beyond.

Why, they tell us that the acquisition of territory is nothing new. That is very true. The policy of our Government heretofore, and its practice, has been to admit territory that was contiguous, until we have become a homogeneous people. All of our territory, except that which we acquired from Russia, is connected by land and subject to defense. The great land power of the world to-day is this country. The next great land power is Russia. No Government since 1812 has ever attempted to invade the United States of America.

No one has ever attempted to invade Russia since the disaster that overtook Napoleon in his retreat from Moscow. Here we are pursuing a policy of our own under the teachings of our fathers to abstain from all trans-Atlantic aggressions, complications, or alliances, building up for ourselves a compact territory, as far as honor will permit remaining at peace with all the world, and we have grown up to be the most powerful nation in the world by pursuing this policy.

To-day we are at war with Spain. And what has been the policy of Spain? Precisely the policy that we, by these resolutions, are invited to enter upon. But a short time ago in modern history Spain was the most powerful nation, probably, on earth. She had her colonies in every land and fronting on every sea. In Europe was her great Kingdom and its dependencies. The whole of South America practically was hers, and part of our own North America was under her flag.

These colonies and the support of them have brought Spain to ruin and bankruptcy. She is unable longer to continue that policy. The last of her colonies upon this continent are about to be taken from her, and nearly all upon the other. This is the policy which has brought ruin and disaster to her, so that she is hardly a respectable enemy in a conflict with a nation that has pursued the opposite policy, that has eschewed colonization and eschewed the idea that we must go over the world in order to map out colonies here and there as a place for American settlement and on which to plant the American flag, and by which we will be involved in large expense in order to maintain and defend them.

Here is the contrast of the two nations to-day. Let us not depart from our policy. This is a departure, and a dangerous departure.

Some one asked the question a while ago how these islands would be governed if we acquired them. It could not be answered. No gentleman has undertaken to answer that question. It is left, I suppose, for the future consideration of Congress.

Suppose you had that question here now, as you will have it if you annex them. How are you going to govern them? Is it to free a people? No. You know you do not intend to do it. Do you intend to give the ballot to the people of Hawaii? You know you do not, although the Constitution declares that everyone born in the United States shall have the right to vote, that he is a citizen, at least, and shall not be disfranchised on account of race or previous condition.

Now, the question arises, When it becomes a part of the territory of the United States, and there are those born on that territory, what are you going to do with them? Are they citizens or not?

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, would they not be subject to taxation if annexed to the United States? And if so, would they not logically be entitled to representation?

Mr. BLAND. Well, I think, as a matter of course, if we are to annex the Hawaiian Islands, and they are to be governed as citizens of the United States, we are bound to permit them to exercise all the rights of citizenship and the right of the ballot; because we have no right to tax them without representation.

The Constitution of the United States provides that every person born in the United States is a citizen thereof. It also provides that no citizen of the United States shall be disfranchised on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. An important question in this connection arises here. There are 39,504 natives on the island, nearly all of whom are of the inferior race. There are only 8,000 Americans. When Hawaii becomes a part of the territory of the United States what shall be said as to the legal status of these 39,000 natives? May they not claim the right of native citizenship, because the territory would then be a part of the United States? They would also be natives of that part of the United States.

It is true that at the date of their birth they were not natives of the United States, but so soon as the territory becomes a part of the United States they would claim and reasonably insist that they are natives of this country. They would insist that the Constitution did not intend to confine nativity to the territory belonging to the United States at the time of the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution of the United States, but that it necessarily includes whatever territory might at any time come within the jurisdiction of the Constitution.

Also, what will be the status of the children born of Chinese, Japanese, and Portuguese parentage? In other words, will not the native inferior race under the Constitution become voters so soon as the territory is admitted, and will not this fact place the whole Government in the hands of the inferior race beyond hope of redemption? Will such a population add to the glory and security of our institutions, or will not the superior race find some pretext to disfranchise the inferiors after they have been admitted, since we know they did that in order to form a treaty of admission?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Do not we do it in the Territories of the United States?

Mr. BLAND. But my friend must remember that in all the admissions of territory and annexation of territories, most of which was done by the policy of Jefferson and his Democratic confreres, it had been territory the climatic conditions of which was admissible for the Caucasian race, admitted for the very purpose of settlement by our own people and our own race, and all these admissions of territory of suitable climate and soil, and being contiguous, it was a fit home for the American citizen; and so it is with your Territory, and if you are not admitted as a State it is not because you are Chinese or Japanese, but because you produce silver. That is your crime.

But I say the same government would practically be introduced in Hawaii as there is now—a government that you on the other side of this House have denounced upon this floor. That is one where the intelligence and the property-holding element control. And they will find a way to control in that island as they have everywhere. But do you want any more such territories? Have we not enough now of race prejudice and race conflict in this country? This race question is not settled here, Mr. Speaker. It is one of the most perplexing problems in the future of this Government to settle, and the more perplexities you add to it the more difficult and the more dangerous it becomes.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasing thing to jingoism, the idea of planting upon the seas war stations for the American flag! They believe that it is great and glorious; but it may end in a denial of suffrage to the people you acquire, to place them under the control of military governors and improvised Congressional legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said that the future of Hawaii is somewhat perplexing. Of course we all understand that. We do not propose that they shall fall into the hands of another government hostile to ours. It is not necessary to annex them in order to carry out that policy. It is understood now. There is no danger of it.

The prime movers for the annexation of Hawaii boldly assert on this floor, and we find it everywhere in the plutocratic press of the country, that Hawaii is necessary to us in our new policy. This new policy is defined as being the permanent occupation of the Philippine Islands, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and whatever other territory we may conquer during this war, and more still, they tell us that we must make alliances with England and Japan, if not openly, then secretly, to the end that we may participate in carving up and parceling out the Chinese Empire.

They tell us that this must be done in order to push our trade in the Orient. We are to be brought immediately into conflict with France, Germany, Russia, Italy, and Austria in these enterprises. We are solaced with the assurances that there are no dangers of war. We are told that even if war should come, that the United States, England, and Japan could hold their own against the world. This is called our new destiny. Every intelligent man knows that all the nations that I have named are armed to the teeth. They present a military camp and they have immense navies. The laboring and producing people of these countries have been taxed in order to keep up these military establishments until they are mere slaves to plutocratic power as represented in militarism. Millions of them have come to our shores because we were exempt from the necessities of military rule.

They love our country because they find freedom here from the enormous burdens and the degrading tyranny of the governments of the Old World. Shall we enter upon a policy that requires immense navies and standing armies and that involves the enormous taxation necessary to maintain them? If we are to prosecute this war for such purposes it will be a source of disappointment to the people who entered upon it in the interest of freedom and not of slavery. Such a policy as this is intended and is urged by its promoters for the purpose of building up in this country a centralized power of wealth with big standing armies and navies to protect this plutocratic control. When our people complain, as the taxpayer will complain, of the burdens thus imposed upon them, plutocracy expects to be able with military power to answer their petition, if necessary, with an array of bayonets.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I would like about five minutes more.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND. And that is where this will lead to. That is why I object to it at this time. It is because the promoters of the annexation of Hawaii foreshadow a policy such as I have alluded to that I most strenuously object to the admission at this time.

I would oppose the annexation of Hawaii under any circumstances, but to annex Hawaii with the avowed purpose of using Hawaii as a precedent, and also as an aid to the acquisition and permanent occupation of colonies everywhere and for the purpose of entering upon schemes of imperialism, meets my earnest and emphatic protest.

You are simply on the road to despotism in this country in trying to free the little island of Cuba. You are on the road to imperialism, with a large Navy and standing armies and oppressive taxation, oppressing labor by putting it down by the military, and adopting a military government instead of republican institutions and constitutional liberty. That is involved in this very discussion.

You may go on for a while under the military spirit and excitement of war, but the day will come for reckoning when your bills are to be footed, when your taxes are to be paid, when bond after bond is to be issued, and when the starving labor begins to "cry 'Peace,' when there is no peace." Your day of reckoning will come, and I call a halt now, for now is the time.

Some gentlemen have spoken to me about leprosy and lepers. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have not time to go into all these questions. No intelligent man here can be deceived as to the population of the Hawaiian Islands. Any intelligent man here knows that they are not our equals in any sense of the word. They do not comprehend our system of government. They are wholly incapable of understanding it. Yet they are entitled to freedom.

It does not matter whether they can govern themselves as well as we can or not. They are entitled to try the experiment of self-government. It belongs to them, or else the Declaration of Independence is a lie in itself. And so it is with Cuba, so it is with

Puerto Rico, so it is with the Philippine Islands. We can do no more than to turn over whatever territory comes under our jurisdiction to their people, free to do with it as they please. And if in the providence of God they are capable of self-government, they will succeed. Above all, our consciences will be free and our liberties not endangered. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARROWS].

Mr. BARROWS. Mr. Speaker, no Congress of the United States since the great civil war has been charged with such momentous responsibilities or has had to face such opportunities as this Congress of which we are members. Some of these responsibilities have come to us unsought. We have met them reluctantly, and yet courageously and with a wonderful unanimity. Now we are face to face with another responsibility and with a great opportunity. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, for myself, that this responsibility is clouded with no apprehensions, it is dimmed with no uncertainty. And this opportunity seems to me so timely, so fair, so honorable, such a natural consummation of history, that I think there is no vote I shall cast in this House, no vote that many of you will cast, upon which I shall look back with more satisfaction than I shall upon the vote for the annexation of Hawaii.

If it is the duty of a patriot to expose the dangers that may confront his country, it is equally his duty to point out the opportunities that lie before it. I sympathize a good deal with those people who say in regard to annexation, "You must go slowly and you must go rightly." In this matter of political and national wedlock, as in the matter of domestic wedlock, we should not marry in haste to repent at leisure. We may well take heed of the counsel in the prayer book that marriage is not to be entered into lightly and unadvisedly, but reverently, discreetly, and with godly fear.

I received thirty years ago some lessons in regard to the annexation of territory when I first came into the service of the United States as secretary to William H. Seward. In 1868 the question came up whether the United States should take possession of a little island south of Santo Domingo which was claimed by our citizens as their own, and they had put up there the American flag. A resolution was offered in the House calling on the President of the United States to take possession of the island.

Mr. Seward said, "We will see to whom it belongs." And it was a part of my humble privilege to assist in that investigation and trace the history of that island back, map by map, until we found that Christopher Columbus himself had discovered it on his second voyage. The evidence placed before the House convinced that body that it would have been an unwarrantable aggression to wrest this island of Alta Vela from Santo Domingo and take possession of it; that the Congress of the United States should not take any land from any nation, however weak, unless right and justice were on its side.

Another question arose just before that, and I came to Washington at the time it was concluded. That was the annexation of Alaska. This was not in the nature of aggression; it was in the nature of a great opportunity. It is interesting to look back now and see what was said at that time. Why, they said the United States was annexing a great iceberg—a grateful suggestion to-day—but it seemed to send the cold chills down the back of the country, and all sorts of predictions were made in regard to it. They said it would take six men-of-war to protect the coast, at a cost of six or eight million dollars a year.

They said the natives there were the most hostile tribes you could find on the continent, and it would cost "$800,000 a head to kill Seward's Indians." A New York paper called it "the Russian humbug," and said, "There is not in the history of diplomacy such insensate folly as this treaty."

But what man is there in Senate or House to-day who would be willing to sell Alaska for $7,000,000? Time has justified the remarkable foresight of William H. Seward.

That treaty was concluded by the Senate after two days' discussion. One of the memorable speeches made on that occasion was by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, Charles Sumner, whose speech is still to-day the highest authority in regard to Alaska. He quoted the words of Goethe, "Ohne hast, ohne rast" (without haste and without rest). An opportunity for annexation had come, and it was accomplished without haste and without delay. So it is here, Mr. Speaker. There is a time in the history of nations when events ripen, and we must take them as they ripen. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENRY] has said, "The apple must be ripe"—and it is a sweet apple, too—"to fall into our basket."

There are times when the event is crude and we must not pluck it. On the other hand, we must not wait until the ripening time has gone by and the fruit falls into decay. We must act at the propitious moment. As the preacher has said, "There is a time for everything under the sun." Right things must be done in the right time, and also in the right way. Now, in this conjuncture of history the right thing to do is to annex Hawaii; the right time to do it is now, and the right way to do it is in this peaceful, honorable way which we are adopting through a resolution of this Congress, ratifying the action of its own Government, and embodying the features of the treaty.

Look at the history of this affair. Look at the ripening process which has been going on. It has been referred to again and again here; but it is necessary to revert to it again. The words of Daniel Webster in 1842 have been quoted, that "the United States are more interested in the fate of these islands and their government than any other nation can be." But had the time come then for annexation, when we had not annexed Texas, when we had not annexed New Mexico, when we had not annexed Colorado or Utah or Nevada or California?

In 1845 we annexed Texas; and that gave to us the privilege of having here the company of some gentlemen whom I see on the other side of this Chamber and who would have been left out if the opposition to the annexation of Texas had prevailed. We went on, and in 1848 we annexed those other States clear to the Pacific. Then, on the 20th of June, 1867, the proclamation with reference to Alaska was issued to the world. What did it mean? It meant that the American eagle, which had been perched away up on the Sierra Nevadas, was about to dive into the Pacific, and when it came up again it was 1,500 miles west of Hawaii. It meant that the geographical center of the United States, which before was about St. Louis, was removed to a point west of San Francisco.

Secretary Fish, in speaking on this question in 1873, said:

The acquisition of territory beyond the sea, outside the present confines of the United States, meets the opposition of many discreet men who are more or less influential in our councils.

Perhaps we may repeat that remark to-day and say that the present movement "meets the opposition of many discreet men who are more or less influential in our councils." But Mr. Fish overlooked the fact that the territory in question was not beyond the confines of the United States. We had insular possessions extending away beyond Hawaii.

I noticed that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] spoke of the islands of the United States being 500 miles west. Well, sir, not depending upon the extempore tape measurements accompanying this globe before the reporters' table [illustrating]—I said to myself we have had too much "red tape" about this matter—I took the pains to go over to the Geodetic Survey and ask how far west the United States possessions extended; and I was told, "If the meridian passing through the westernmost point of Attu Island, of the Aleutian Isles, is continued to the latitude of Honolulu, that meridian would be 1,525 nautical miles, or 1,755 statute miles, west of Honolulu." So that Hawaii comes largely within the boundaries of the United States.

It is said we are going beyond our precedents, going outside of our history, to annex islands that are removed from us by such a space. But the map will show what we did when we annexed Alaska. We had to step over 590 miles of British territory to get to the very fringe of Alaska along the coast; and when we took that step, it was equal to stepping over the distance from Maryland to Florida. It is as if we said, "We will annex Florida, and to do so we will step over Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia." That is what we did then. But we all know that the accessibility of Hawaii in point of time is at least twice that of Alaska by land. It is far easier to travel by water the 2,000 miles separating us from Hawaii than the 590 miles overland to Alaska.

Mr. Speaker, there are conjunctures in history, and this is one of them. I am not going to lay great stress upon the war side of this opportunity. That has been fully amplified already. I want to say rather that to me this seems a great peace opportunity. The supreme satisfaction is that this union does not come through the great tragedy of war, but through the blessed reciprocity of peace. Dewey will not need to thunder at the gates of Honolulu as he thundered at Manila. Willing hands are waiting there to welcome him. In no place on the globe will his returning fleet be more welcome than it will be in Hawaii, and I hope when he gets there he will find the American flag floating over it.

I do not underrate the importance of Hawaii as a naval station. That is a matter which hardly needs to be discussed. We need only look at the map and see the position of Hawaii, and we need only appeal to the testimony of eminent naval authorities, to settle that question. If we were dealing merely with a group of barren islands, their only value would be as a naval station; but fortunately these islands are so rich and fertile that they are worth far more to us as instrumentalities of peace than as instrumentalities of war.

I insist, too, Mr. Speaker, that in this matter of annexation we shall take up questions as they come to us and deal with them on their own merits. The annexation of Hawaii does not depend on what we are going to do with the Philippines. That question we can decide when the time comes. Three treaties of annexation have been negotiated with Hawaii under three different Governments, and they have all been negotiated with reference to the immediate relations of Hawaii with the United States.

When the last treaty was negotiated, which is practically embodied in this resolution, war with Spain was not thought of and the question of the Philippines was beyond our remotest dream. Admiral Dewey has taught us some lessons in geography and as to the necessities of modern naval warfare. They clinch the argument for the annexation of Hawaii; but if the brave admiral had never fired a gun at Manila, the argument for annexing the islands, founded on considerations of peace, amity, reciprocity, would have remained unanswerable.

The history of these islands is unique. Through the devoted labors of American missionaries they were redeemed from barbarism. They gradually emerged into the light of civilization. They grew up a feeble but independent Government. For a long time they were under the rule of a corrupt and half-barbarous monarchy. They broke away finally from this effete barbarism and established a republican Government. It is the steady influence of American life, principles, and institutions exerted under the protection of our Republic which has made the Sandwich Islands grow and expand in education, intelligence, political freedom, and the arts of peace. Hawaii has reversed the history of our colonial times in one respect. Instead of asking to be severed from the mother country to whom she really owes her political life, she asks to be joined to it; and the mother is willing to own her child.

It is said that we are annexing Hawaii against the will of her people, but there is no more ground for saying this than that we are annexing them against the will of the people of the United States. The fact is that each nation acts through its representative Government. If the referendum does not exist in Hawaii, it does not exist here. Treaties in the United States are not submitted to the people. They are negotiated by the executive department and confirmed by the Senate.

In the Alaska purchase the question did not even come into the House of Representatives until after the treaty was concluded. It was ratified in the Senate after only two days of discussion, and only two Senators voting against it. Whether it is best to introduce the referendum in this vast country of ours on national questions is a different matter. Even in little Switzerland there are many objections to it. I do not think that international relations can be better effected or adjusted than through the combined action of the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

In our frequent political campaigns there is abundant opportunity to discuss national questions and elect men who represent them. The petition presented against annexation from the Hawaiian Islands was largely signed by minors and was evidently prepared by followers of the deposed and dissolute monarchy. That relic of barbarism has had its day in Hawaii, and the natives are under a better government, whether they know it or not. When I am told that these people may suffer by coming under the American flag, I reply that neither these nor any other people that I know of have anything to lose by coming under the protection of the American flag. The people of Hawaii have everything to gain, nothing to lose.

In this union the advantages on both sides are evident. What shall we get by annexation? We shall get a group of fertile islands, valuable for commerce, valuable also as a naval station, and we shall remove these islands from the arena of international dispute, which might easily endanger peace.

But, Mr. Speaker, one of the satisfactory things to me is that by this step we shall not only get a good deal, but shall give even more than we get. What will Hawaii get? She will get the privilege of hoisting the American flag—the most beautiful flag in the world. And what will that mean? It will mean that she shall enter into and share our liberties, that she shall share our history, and that she shall also share our future.

To me it seems a beautiful consummation of that early heroic effort of our New England missionaries, who went there and planted the seeds of civilization; a natural consummation that, after these long years, we can say, "You have carried the American flag so many years in your hearts, and now we can hoist it over your land." Then it will be but a little time when we shall extend the cable to Hawaii, and it will feel the great pulses of life, intelligence, civilization, power, and vitality which radiate everywhere from this Government. Then the time factor will be obliterated. You know when we had that interesting chess match with London a message was sent over of a move, and in thirty-seven seconds thereafter the answer came back. When we get the cable to Hawaii, Hawaii will be nearer to us than Baltimore was to Washington in 1842.

I look forward, Mr. Speaker, with satisfaction to the consummation of this history, and I count myself fortunate to be here and take part in it by casting my vote in its favor. Charles Sumner, in his great speech on Alaska, said:

More happy than Austria, who acquired possessions by marriage, we shall acquire them by the attraction of republican institutions. Bestow such a government, and you will give what is better than all you receive.

We may well repeat, too, the words of Sumner, quoting those of Goethe, "Without haste and without rest." We have not hastened, and do not let us delay. We have waited these sixty years, and now, I say, do not let us rest until we have done our duty. Do not let this Congress adjourn until it has annexed Hawaii to the United States.

Mr. HITT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, our nation, now the envy and admiration of the world, has grown from a feeble confederacy of thirteen struggling States to its present posture of grandeur and importance not alone by its superiority of race, but by means of expansion of territory and by a very wonderful expansion of the means and methods of civilized life. Nations, like individuals, are a development, a growth, an expansion, an extension, an aggregation of means and methods.

The silly argument of national isolation, the outgrowth of fear and timidity, is lame and impotent. No colonial nation has been involved in war by reason of her colonial possessions until she became degenerate and lost the regard and allegiance of her colonies. Every nation must at all times be prepared to protect its citizens and interests abroad, and in order to do this we must have mid-stations as bases of supply and resort, in order that our just resentment against foreign nations may be sure and certain of management and control.

The argument that gentlemen make with reference to these islands not being contiguous is unworthy of support. They face and confront the whole Pacific coast, either frowning at us as a menace or smiling as a blessing. These islands are necessary if the Nicaragua Canal is to be built, a project soon to be consummated, and to be one of the greatest and most beneficent public works of modern times, and to be to us a glorious blessing or an egregious curse. Gentlemen on the other side, with tearful solicitude for our Constitution, and knowing our tender regard for that majestic instrument, interpose it as a bar, forgetful that such distinguished jurists as Marshall and Taney have justified the acquisition of foreign territory, indisputably, under the constitutional provisions of the treaty-making power and the right to declare and carry on war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was reserved to the scriptural gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to fear the result of our contact with the degenerate inhabitants of Hawaii. If history is read aright the solemn lesson is taught that when the superior race comes in contact with the inferior the inferior must go to the wall or else be capable of development and advancement. The Indian is fast disappearing, like his favorite buffalo that he delighted to hunt and regretted to kill, while the negro race is advancing and growing in numbers, power, and importance. The doctrine of the survival of the fittest is as enduring as time itself and as certain.

Our country has arisen from lusty youth to vigorous manhood. We must share the responsibilities as well as the blessings of modern civilization. We must participate in the world's destiny. The stars of both hemispheres will light us on, and the clouds of both perchance at times will darken our path. The bitter and the sweet must both be partaken of. Sturdy manhood is used to both, and together are the reward and fruition of all ripe experience. The blessings of our free republican Government should not be selfishly isolated or hugged to our own bosoms alone, but the Stars and Stripes, amid the Pacific and Atlantic, should salute the dying dynasties of the Eastern World and bid them a cordial welcome and renewed life and a vigorous existence under its starry folds. [Applause.]

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, as a citizen of one of our Western Territories I protest against this unnecessary haste in annexing the Islands of Hawaii to our possessions, and especially do I protest when I believe the real owners of those islands are opposed to annexation. Amid war's excitements and alarm we are apt to be swept from our feet and thrown into paths and policies dangerous to the future government of our country. When the war shall have ended and the smoke of battle cleared from our vision, when we shall have regained the thoughtful and reflective nature of peace, we shall have time enough to pass on these questions thoughtfully, philosophically, and, I trust, wisely.

We had better admit to the Union our Territories before we begin this doubtful deal in islandic real estate.

Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma are in every particular fully qualified for the duties and responsibilities of Statehood. I have so often described the resources of Arizona in committee and on this floor that I will not now detain the House with its repetition. If you willfully refuse to justly or properly govern your present territory, what can we expect for Hawaii and what can she hope for herself when the hand of your avarice and greed is at her throat?

Arizona, the fairest subdivision of North America, with boundless resources, with a population second in energy, enterprise, and education to no Congressional district represented on this floor, has been forced for thirty-five years to pay tribute to the States, and in all that weary time has received not one cent from the Federal Treasury that was not due as a moral and legal obligation; and while the hand of taxation has been busy with her property, the hand of despotism has kept silent her voice.

I recall an incident in Boston Harbor that made history, yet taxation without representation is as wrong now as it was then, and those of you who impose this on us are degenerate sons of sires who, rather than submit to such exaction, freely pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. I could stand your treatment of us with more equanimity if we were more deserving of it. But we do not deserve it at all.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that Arizona is indeed a land of sunshine and silver; a land where every farmer makes his own rain, where the rewards of industry are as unerring as the decrees of God; a land where wonder treads on beauty's heels and riches rush to meet the earnest seeker; a land whose resources are as varied as the prismatic lights and splendors which bathe her sunsets in resplendent glory. And we cast all these away from our consideration and with avaricious eyes gaze across 2,100 miles of ocean's dreary waste and covet an island filled with a sugar trust, Chinese, Japanese, lepers, hula-hula dancers, and other volcaneos. [Laughter.]

If you prefer this company to our society as a State, we can stand it; but we would like your society better if you were more select, sirs. The greed of empire has led, and will lead, to the destruction of every nation that the world has marshaled on the fields of time.

We are doing pretty well as compared with the nations of the earth. Whatever the proper position is to take with regard to Hawaii hereafter, there is danger in action now. We should not be misled to hasty action by those visiting statesmen who spent nearly eight days in Hawaii and return to us as the representatives of the Hawaiian Republic in urging its admission to the Union. [Laughter.]

I do not like the looks of these Trojan horses—Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes. No, sirs; I prefer, in the progress of a nation's prosperity, one wheat field in a former desert waving in full fruitage at the touch of gentle breezes far above the elegance and grace of any hula-hula dance in the most refined society of any island in all the seas.

In a new nation—and we are yet new and young—it is far better to see one happy home reared by honest Anglo-Saxon hands on the plains of the West than to have added to our body politic any number of Chinese or other alien cheap labor, dominated as they will always be by some enormous combine or trust.

One-tenth of the money you will spend in fortifying Pearl Harbor and providing otherwise for its defense would easily reclaim 5,000,000 acres of desert land in the West, which would easily support a population of English-speaking people of at least 5,000,000 souls. Compare this with what you get in Hawaii and think before you leap. Let not the siren song of some of our singers across the aisle lull our patriotic vigilance into fateful sleep. We have plenty to do at home. We have more land and more resources in Arizona alone, which Congress can easily encourage and perfect, than the whole Hawaiian Islands contain.

Let justice, as well as charity, begin at home. Develop your own Territories before you attempt to acquire other lands. You will divert by this resolution the attention of States away from our western domain and fasten it on undesirable possessions in the seas. A desire to steal from the ignorant inhabitants of the islands will lessen the purpose of working to build homes on the plains or dig treasure from our mountains.

The farther you remove our possessions the more credulous we become in hearing stories of the wealth which remote countries are handing out to all applicants, and swarms of people rush heedlessly over the boundless treasures of the Western plains and mountains to follow this elusive will-o'-the-wisp across the seas. There are many objections to the annexation of these islands other than I have already stated.

The population is objectionable. The last census shows the following:

Natives.....	39,504
Chinese.....	25,407
Japanese.....	21,616
Portuguese.....	15,291
American.....	3,080
German.....	1,432
English.....	2,250

How is our action in taking into our body politic the virus here shown to help us or anybody else except the sugar kings of the islands? We have passed laws against Chinese immigration to this country and have spent vast sums in keeping them out, and yet in this one act you make American citizens, or at least American residents, of 25,000 Chinese, free to leave the cheap wages of Hawaii and come freely into our Western States and directly compete with our educated labor and break down still further the present small compensation given for a day of toil.

Not only this, but the very floodgates of China would be opened upon us through Hawaii. Every applicant for admission would prove by 100 witnesses that he was a resident of Hawaii at the time of its annexation, and the bars would be let down. There is not an intelligent body of organized labor in this country that does not oppose at this time the resolution now before us. Whatever may be the proper course to pursue with these islands hereafter, and I am not now indicating what that course should be, this is of all times the worst to act.

The war which was thrust on us by the brutality of Spain is now in full progress. We are virtually in possession of the Philippine Islands by the unparalleled skill and courage of Dewey and his men. We are preparing to invade Cuba and Puerto Rico. Peace will come some day, and in the settlement of its terms the future policy of this Government toward these islands can be settled all at once, without this Hawaiian precedent as a landmark for our guidance.

Rather than commit my country now to the imperial policy of colonial accretion and colonial government, I would turn the money necessary to such a course to the development of our internal resources, and reap thereby a richer harvest than the wildest dream will ever see growing on these coveted islands.

I live in the West, and I love it and its people. Their hope and mine is to see it grow and flourish, as it will with half the help your course now offers to the foreign hordes I have just mentioned. I am driven by these reflections to an advocacy of further internal improvements instead of preparing by your present policy to increase the Army in time of peace, and thus place labor under a tax to drones and nonproducers. I would put an equal army at work to make glad the waste places, an army of industrious workmen employed at fair wages, and bringing into fruitage lands now barren and worthless.

I notice with concern and recognize with disgust the fact that those gentlemen on this floor whose zeal is the most ardent to spend money, incur debts, take risks of foreign complications and domestic discord in aid of a worthless island 2,000 miles and more from any present American harbor, are the very identical gentlemen who refuse to let one dollar go to the necessary development of our Territories and even refuse to give us the right to elect our own officers.

Whatever through your wisdom or folly you may do with these Hawaiian Islands, I pray God you will protect them from the benign rule of present Territorial government. Arizona is more entitled to home rule than these Japs and Chinese are to annexation. I protest against your preference.

Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House no longer, except to give notice, if the opportunity will be permitted me, to move an amendment, by way of a substitute, which will leave Hawaii in statu quo and give statehood to Arizona. If this be ruled out of order, I shall move to amend by adding at the end of the resolution the bill I introduced, the purpose of which was to permit Arizona to elect her own officers. Against that bill no reasonable objection has been urged or can be urged. To refuse this is a political crime. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIRKPATRICK].

[Mr. KIRKPATRICK addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a history-making Congress. The Republican party, which has proven equal to every emergency ever confronting it, has now, in less than half the term of one Administration, not only been able to restore prosperity to our country, has not only decreed that Cuba shall be free and that no European nation will be allowed to carry on barbarous warfare on this continent, has not only established more firmly than ever the absolute supremacy and leadership of the United States upon the American Continent, but the Republican party now proposes to establish the supremacy of the United States upon the Pacific Ocean.

The leaders on the other side of this House tell us that this is a new departure, which threatens the unity of our Government and the perpetuation of our principles. It is not necessary to deny that the proposed annexation of the Hawaiian Islands constitutes a new departure in the policy of our Government, for whether it does or not makes no difference. While other parties may discuss and quarrel whether a proposed plan is a new departure or not, the Republican party has ever been willing to decide the case upon its own merits and has never shrunk from doing that which is right and advantageous because it might be called a new departure.

But what a strange criticism to fall from the lips of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], of the gentlemen from Missouri [Mr. CLARK and Mr. BLAND], of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and other gentlemen representing States and Territories west of the Mississippi. The annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is not so great a departure from the policy of our Government as was the annexation of New Orleans and Louisiana. When President Jefferson, with constitutional doubts in his mind, decided upon the purchase of New Orleans for the purpose of protecting the commerce of the country then constituting our western limit along the Mississippi River, he made a new departure. He said:

Previous, however, to this period we had not been unaware of the danger to which our peace would be perpetually exposed while so important a key to the commerce of the Western country remained under foreign power.

It was Thomas Jefferson who inaugurated the policy of adding to our Western country for the express purpose of guarding the commerce on our western shore. It was Jefferson who decided, with or without express constitutional authority, that it was necessary for this country to own the outlet and both banks of the Mississippi River. That step taken by Jefferson was a far greater "departure" from the policy of our Government than is now the annexation of Hawaii.

And yet the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], who lives in and represents a part of the Louisiana purchase, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who lives in and represents a part of the Louisiana purchase, cry with holy horror against the idea of protecting now our western coast by the annexation of new territory.

If their ideas had prevailed in 1803, the country west of the Mississippi River would have been lost to the United States. Another great and powerful nation would have grown up on the west of that river. The story of history would have been changed.

Fortunately for our country, a greater man then stood as the leader of the Democratic party than has recently appeared. You on the other side of this House revere the name of Thomas Jefferson, but you do not respect his principles or his example.

Our country has had but one war relating to the extension of territory. The war with Mexico was because of the annexation of Texas. Out of that war grew the extension of our territory along the Pacific coast; from that war came into the Union California and much other territory, and yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who has the opportunity of being the leader of his party on the floor of this House simply and solely because of the extension of our territory, is now worried and fearful because we propose to annex additional territory in order that we may protect the commerce and the cities of California which comes to us because we engaged in a war over the annexation of his own home.

If the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], who has now discovered the port or island of Unalaska, up near the North Pole, as the most available coal and supply harbor between San Francisco and Yokohama, had lived in the days of Jefferson, he would undoubtedly have made a discovery of equal value, that the best and shortest route from the Upper Mississippi River was by way of Hudson Bay to England, and that Thomas Jefferson was ignorant of geography in presuming that New Orleans was necessary to the maintenance of our commerce on the Mississippi River.

Mr. Speaker, there never was a plainer proposition than the one for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands. Politicians seeking for political advantage may endeavor to obscure it by sophistry and by special pleading. But the American people understand the situation. They know full well that it is an absolute necessity for the protection of our interests upon the great Pacific Ocean and for the protection of our own great Pacific shore line that the Hawaiian Islands should become part and parcel of the United States.

The distance from the Asiatic coast to the Isthmus of Panama is 9,500 miles—as far as from San Francisco to the boundary of Persia. The distance between Unalaska and Tahiti, the nearest ports north and south of Hawaii, is 4,400 miles—farther than from Greenland to the mouth of the Amazon River. In all this wide expanse of water on the Pacific Ocean there is but one ample base of supplies where food, water, coal, or repairs can be promptly and properly obtained. For us to refuse to annex the Hawaiian Islands would be like ceding the mouth of the Potomac River, which protects Washington, or like placing in the enemy's hands the forts which protect any of our seaport cities.

Hawaii is the fort which protects the Pacific coast; it is the base of supplies of the Pacific Ocean; it is the defense guard of the American continent; it is the sentinel which watches closely for the enemy from the far East.

The Hawaiian Islands are of more importance in the control of the Pacific Ocean than Gibraltar is of the Mediterranean Sea.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss in detail the figures relating to the Hawaiian Islands or the opinion in regard to their annexation which has been entertained by the eminent statesmen of America, but I wish to attach as part of my remarks the wonderful address delivered by the Hon. Lorrin A. Thurston, of Honolulu, before the Hamilton Club, of Chicago, on January 11 last.

Mr. Speaker, wars are now fought by strategy. The combats which this country will engage in in the future will be mostly upon the seas. The greatest one strategical point in the world is the Hawaiian Islands. No other single spot is of such commanding influence. No other point on the surface of the globe can be of so great advantage in determining the future control of the Pacific Ocean as these islands.

In the history of humanity, in the world of nations, a hundred years is but a short while. It is true that we have made such wonderful progress in our own country within the last one hundred years that it is hard for us to appreciate this fact. But that statesman who, in considering the effect of increase of territory upon his country, does not endeavor in his mind's eye to glance over the possibilities of the intervening future space between now and hundreds of years from now takes but a shortsighted view of human affairs. We live and work and strive and study that our posterity may be more secure, more enlightened, more at liberty, and more progressive.

Mr. Speaker, ever since the story of history has been recorded, either as fact or fancy, it has related to the growth and push of humanity moving from the east to the west. The glories of Assyria, and Babylon, and Persia, and Greece have long since departed, and their mantle has fallen upon countries farther west. But during all this history the west was overrun first by the east. Rome fell before the Goths and the Vandals and the Huns. Attila and Mohammed should each teach us the dangers that may come from foreign invasion caused either by an outpouring of barbarous hordes or religious enthusiasm.

To-day we stand at the morning of a new day for a country far across the sea. The tide of the movement of humanity from the East to the West has now circumnavigated the globe. It has rolled from the eastern shore of the Pacific across Asia and Europe, across the Atlantic Ocean, across America to the western shore of our continent. Every sign of the times points to the rejuvenation of China. Within the life of a generation, little Japan, which had lain dormant for so long, received into its body the new breath of life, and it has sprung forward in civilization as quickly as though the gods had breathed the breath of life into its nostrils. Who knows how soon new life will be breathed into the petrified civilization of China? The immobility of despotic sway has already given way in Japan. The yoke of tradition may soon be broken in the great Empire of China.

From Yau to McKinley is from the beginning to the present of human history. Where will it end? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the real awakening of China has commenced; that within a few years or a few hundred years—and in either case our policy should be the same as to this annexation—we will be in active commercial competition with the Chinese. The man who belittles the intellectual capacity or the mechanical skill and adaptability of the Chinese belittles his own intelligence and knowledge. Across the Pacific will be fought out the greater problems of the future; across the Pacific will be fought the question of racial supremacy between the Mongolian and Caucasian races. We have driven the red race out of the race of life. A white civilization has taken possession of the territory of the blacks in Africa. Everywhere there is going on a struggle for supremacy.

When China is reawakened, when she is open to the world, when her people come in commercial and intellectual competition with the white race of the world, she and her people, whether dominated by themselves or by the Europeans, will enter upon a race of commercial success which may imperil our own.

We are prone to deal with questions like this upon our possession of present knowledge and present facts. Who knows how quickly the trip across the Pacific Ocean may be made a hundred years from now? Who knows what progress may be made in the improvement of ocean navigation? Who knows what developments may be made on our western shore and upon the eastern shore of Asia? Who knows what conflicts may come and how much may be at stake? Who knows but that in the future an Asiatic race, which is now shut out from our nation by severe laws, may surround us on the north and the south, and may some day, with their superior numbers, endeavor to obtain by war the right of entry to our land?

If I have read and studied aright the lessons of history, the battles for supremacy which in the past were fought out on the Ganges, on the Nile, in the Mediterranean, across the English Channel, on the Atlantic, will at some time in the future be fought across the Pacific Ocean. When that time comes, as come it will, the American flag will be protecting the Caucasian race, will be upholding the honor and dignity of the American people, will be furnishing security to our Pacific coast, will be providing support to our Pacific commerce, will be insuring the tranquillity, the supremacy, and liberty of our people as it floats in grandeur over land and sea at the Hawaiian Islands.

ADDRESS OF HON. LORRIN A. THURSTON, OF HONOLULU, DELIVERED BEFORE THE HAMILTON CLUB, OF CHICAGO, ON JANUARY 11, 1898.

Subject: The annexation of Hawaii—will it be advantageous to the United States?

Mr. President, I am not an American citizen and never expect to live within the jurisdiction of the United States, unless perchance the Stars and Stripes shall some day float to the breeze as the emblem of authority over the palm groves of Honolulu; but there are stronger ties than acts of Congress, and reasons more potent than present commercial values or technical jurisdiction, why we of Hawaii and you of America should counsel together for the common good; and there is no more appropriate occasion for so doing than at a meeting commemorative of the name of Hamilton, one of the most practical of the great constructive statesmen of America; nor could there be a more appropriate place for such consideration than this imperial city, the halfway house of the continent, this living monument to the practical energies of the American people.

In considering the present and future relations of Hawaii and the United States we can not lose sight of the fact that Hawaiian Christianization, civilization, commerce, education, and development are the direct product of American effort; that Hawaii is, in every element and quality which enters into the composition of a modern civilized community, a child of America; that Hawaii is the one American colony beyond the borders of the Union; that Honolulu is the one port of the world where the Stars and Stripes float over more ships than all other flags combined; that out of all this has grown a sentimental feeling toward Hawaii which does not measure its regard in dollars or material advantage.

All of this I recognize and appreciate, and on behalf of those beyond the water who are bearing the brunt of the fight and who anxiously wait from week to week to know whether they are to be welcomed into the mystic circle which surrounds this "land of the free and home of the brave" or whether they are to be left alone to solve the doubts and uncertainties of the future—on behalf of these I thank you, and through you the American people, for the warm sympathy and earnest support which we have received from thousands of Americans.

Sympathy counts for much, and sentiment is still an international factor; but this is not the age of the crusader. It is the age of the practical statesman who wants to know the ending of a policy before he makes a beginning, of the practical business man who calculates the profit before he invests a dollar, and it is on the practical issue that we rest our case.

Appreciating your sympathy, thanking you for your kindly sentiment, we of Hawaii who believe in the policy of annexation for the benefit of Hawaii urge it upon you of America upon the ground that from a purely practical and business standpoint America needs Hawaii more than Hawaii needs America; and we ask your support of the measure as one preeminently of national economy and protection, present and future, to the political and commercial welfare of this country as well as of Hawaii.

From the day of its creation this has been a growing, developing country. Washington, once a loyal British subject, by the evolution of circumstances became a rebel against his king and fought against the flag under which he was born.

Jefferson, the emblem of conservatism, the foremost leader of the theory of strict construction of the Constitution, who held that annexation of territory would be a violation of the Constitution, became himself the father of annexation and demonstrated his claim to statesmanship by reversing his policy, annexing Louisiana, and by a stroke of the pen changing the United States from a strip on the Atlantic to a continental country reaching from ocean to ocean.

Lincoln avowed himself against the abolition of slavery, and within five years had freed the last slave and wiped slavery off the American continent forever.

With such a series of precedents demonstrating the fallibility of human precedents, and the certainty that as conditions change policies must change with them, no nation should allow the opinions of a past generation to dominate its judgment concerning its present interests. Wisdom did not die with the makers of the Constitution or the succeeding statesmen, and the present generation knows better what its present necessities are than did those of a generation ago; but it is a sound proverb that "Fools learn by their own experience; wise men by the experience of others," and while basing your action upon the conditions and necessities of the present and the probabilities of the future, it is well to take counsel of the past and study the views of the great American statesmen who have considered and dealt with this identical question for the past sixty years.

It has been said that the United States has no continuous foreign policy. The interest in affairs beyond the borders of the Union has alternately waxed and waned; but for sixty years one consistent and persistent policy has been maintained by the American Government and every department and party thereof concerning Hawaii. Whigs, Democrats, Republicans, and Populists; supporters of the single gold standard and advocates of free silver; nine Presidents, eleven Secretaries of State, the highest authorities in the Army and Navy, the Senate and the House of Representatives, all have united in the declaration that under no circumstances or conditions would the United States allow any foreign power to annex, control, or colonize Hawaii.

One of the phrases in President McKinley's message to the Senate reads: "Annexation is not a change, it is a consummation." This is not rhetoric. It is a statement of a fact.

President Tyler first enunciated the policy of exclusion of other powers from Hawaii in 1842. Within the next ten years, by reason of French and English aggressions in Hawaii, Secretaries of State Legaré, Clayton, and Webster successively announced officially that the American Government would, if necessary, execute its exclusion policy by force.

In 1851, upon receiving notice from the American consul in Honolulu of French depredations, Secretary Webster replied:

"I hope the French will not take possession; but if they do they will be dislodged, if my advice is taken, if the whole power of the Government is required to do it."

Up to 1854 the exclusion policy did not contemplate possession by the United States; but there then took place an evolution in the method of making that policy effective, and we find President Pierce and Secretary of State Marcy negotiating a treaty of annexation with the King of Hawaii, which failed of execution only by the premature death of the King after the treaty had been agreed upon and engrossed for signature. From that time to the present almost every President and Secretary of State has advocated the annexation of Hawaii. Johnson and Grant advocated it in messages to Congress; Cleveland approved of it during his first Administration; Harrison and McKinley negotiated annexation treaties; Seward and Fish successively instructed the American minister at Honolulu to attempt to bring it about; Blaine, Bayard, Foster, and Sherman have strenuously advocated it.

In 1851 Admiral Dupont, in a formal report on the coast defenses of the United States, said:

"The position of Halifax, Bermuda, and the West Indies must ever be borne in mind where fleets may wait for a fitting opportunity for incursions. To suppose that there is to be no such thing as a surprise, because railroads have been invented and hollow shot cast, seems to be taking for granted that human life has changed. Those who indulge in such theoretical securities are preparing themselves for surprises; perilous ones, too."

"In the Pacific we already have outposts on our flanks in the hands of first-class powers."

"It is impossible to estimate too highly the value and importance of the Sandwich Islands, whether in a commercial or military point of view. Should circumstances ever place them in our hands, they would prove the most important acquisition we could make in the whole Pacific Ocean—an acquisition intimately connected with our commercial and naval supremacy in those seas. Be this as it may, these islands should never be permitted to pass into the possession of any European power."

In the wake of Dupont have followed the great military and naval authorities of the country. To-day we have General Schofield, Admiral Walker, Admiral Belknap, Captain Mahan, and, so far as I know, every prominent official in both the Army and the Navy strenuously, ardently advocating annexation.

I would call to your attention the fact that, although nearly every President and Secretary of State from 1842 to 1897 has placed himself officially on record concerning Hawaii, there is not a line or word from one of them in opposition to the principle of annexation.

Now that in the natural course of events, to use the words of Secretary Bayard, "the apple is ripe and ready to fall," now that the people of the United States have within their grasp the results of sixty years of statesmanship, we are met by a new school of statesmen who proclaim that the past policy of the United States is all a blunder and a mistake; that you do not want Hawaii at any price; that it will be a source of weakness in time of war and an expense in time of peace; that the coast line is the proper line of defense; that if annexation takes place the first proper step in case of war would be to withdraw from Hawaii and make a stand at San Francisco.

On the other hand, the exact contrary is claimed. The issue is clear cut. Which is right?

If it is true that the possession of Hawaii will weaken, why should this country object to other countries acquiring possession and thereby weakening themselves?

Did Legaré in 1843, and Clayton in 1850, and Webster in 1851, advocate war, if war was necessary, to keep England and France out of Hawaii by reason of an altruistic friendship so keen that they were willing to shed American blood to prevent those nations from taking action which would weaken them?

When Marcy and Pierce in 1854, in pursuance of the traditional Democratic doctrine of annexation, attempted to annex Hawaii, were they treacherously trying to weaken this Government, or did they have softening of the brain?

When President Grant in 1871, in a confidential message, urged the Senate to consider the annexation of Hawaii, was he playing into the hands of the enemy, or were his brilliant military instincts smitten with temporary paralysis?

The opposition flippantly reply to opinions presented by military and naval authorities: "Oh, they are in favor of getting up a fight so as to magnify their own importance and secure promotion." Do you believe it?

When, in 1851, Admiral Dupont embodied in his formal and official report on the coast defenses of the United States that "it is impossible to estimate too highly the value and importance of the Sandwich Islands, whether in a commercial or military point of view," and that "they would prove the most important acquisition we could make in the whole Pacific Ocean," was he scheming for promotion, or was he demonstrating his ignorance?

When Captain Mahan states that Hawaii is one of the most remarkable strategical points in the world; that it possesses importance as a factor in the attack or defense of your coast line "rarely concentrated in a single position, and the circumstance renders it doubly imperative upon us to secure it, if we righteously can," is he sordidly seeking his own selfish aggrandizement or is he assmitten with the microbe of incompetence?

When both Houses of Congress in 1894 passed unanimous resolutions to the effect that "any intervention in the political affairs of Hawaii by any other government will be regarded as an act unfriendly to the United States," votes participated in by some of the very men who now condemn proposed American control in Hawaii, what did they mean?

If intervention and control in Hawaii weakens, why should Congress declare such process of weakening itself by another government to be an act "unfriendly to the United States?"

Were these resolutions simply an exhibition of ultra-native American "cussedness," the final quintessence of the dog-in-the-manger policy, or were they simply the final chapter in a volume of national stupidity?

If the possession of Hawaii will weaken this Government, then its statesmen and its military and naval experts for two generations have either been supremely ignorant or supremely wicked. Either they were lacking in knowledge of the first principles of statesmanship and defensive warfare, or they have been parties to sixty years of conspiracy to deliver their country into the hands of its enemies.

That is the indictment, and the verdict must be guilty, unless it can be shown that Hawaii is a strategical point of value and that the possession of Hawaii will be a source of strength to the United States in time of war.

The question at issue is: "Is Hawaii a strategical point the possession and control of which will strengthen the United States in time of war?"

I take it that a strategical point may be defined as one which, by reason of its position, its strength, or its resources will give an advantage to its possessor over its rivals.

It is said by the new-school statesmen that the first act of a hostile country after war broke out would be to seize Hawaii and take it away from the United States. Is not this assertion a recognition of the strategical value of Hawaii?

Any country at war with the United States will have no time for simply annoying tactics. It will be obliged to strain every nerve and resource to strengthen its strictly military position. If the enemy take Hawaii, it will be for the purpose of strengthening themselves, and to enable them the better to attack you.

If the possession of Hawaii will help them to more effectively attack you—will give them an advantage which they would not otherwise possess—then it is a strategical point which it will be to your advantage to keep out of their possession.

If possession would give the enemy a small advantage only, a correspondingly slight defensive effort might be offered. If, on the other hand, possession would give them a commanding advantage, then they should be excluded from such possession by the United States at all hazards.

Whether Hawaii is or is not an important or commanding strategical point does not depend upon the opinion of statesmen or military experts, but upon the facts.

What are the facts?

(1) The distance from the Asiatic coast to the Isthmus of Panama is 9,500 miles, as far as from San Francisco eastward across the continent, the Atlantic, the Mediterranean and Turkey to the boundary of Persia.

The distance between Unalaska and Tahiti, the nearest ports north and south of Hawaii, is 4,400 miles, as far as from Greenland to 500 miles south of the mouth of the Amazon River.

In all this vast area there is but one spot where food, water, coal, or repairs can be obtained by a passing vessel.

From the equator to the Arctic, from Asia to the American Continent, Hawaii is the only supply station.

(2) Cruisers and gunboats have their uses, but the effective weapon of naval warfare is the battle ship. By reason of their heavy armor and guns their coal capacity is but limited. England has a few ships which, by reducing their speed to 10 knots an hour, could, provided contrary storms were not encountered, cross, with a few hundred tons of coal to spare; but with this exception there is not now built or building in the American or any other navy a battle ship capable of steaming, even at the most economical speed, from the coast of Asia to the Pacific coast of the United States without recaling, for the simple reason that they can not carry enough coal, even by piling their decks full.

The coal radius of the average battle ship steaming at full speed is 2,000 miles, and steaming at 10 knots an hour it is from 3,200 to 3,500 miles.

The distance from Hongkong to San Francisco is 5,500 miles, and from Yokohama is 4,500 miles.

As there is no spot above water in the North Pacific where coal can be obtained, except Hawaii, it follows that if coal can not be obtained there battle ships can not cross the Pacific at all.

How, then, does this effect the strategic value of Hawaii?

It means that by simply keeping other nations out of Hawaii the United States will thereby secure immunity from serious trans-Pacific attack, because other bases of supply are too far away to be available.

It means that any nation in control of Hawaii would possess a base of supply and repair within five days' steaming distance of any part of the Pacific coast, and be a standing menace not only to the cities of the coast, but to all American commerce on the North Pacific.

On the other hand, if other nations are kept out of Hawaii, the available bases of supply are pushed back the entire width of the Pacific, a distance which Captain Mahan pronounces too great for sustained maritime operations.

(3) The importance of Hawaii does not rest alone upon its value as a strictly military base. That gives it the name of the "Key of the Pacific."

It is also known as the "Crossroads of the Pacific" by reason of the fact that it lies on the line of almost every trade route between the Asiatic, American, and Australian continents.

Of the seven steamship lines between Vancouver, Tacoma, Portland, and San Francisco, running to Japan, China, Australia, and the South Pacific islands, six make Honolulu a way station, and when the Isthmian Canal is opened the vast tide of commerce which will pour through it and across the Pacific to the coast of Asia will all pass the doors of Hawaii.

The power that holds Hawaii is in a position to absolutely control trans-Pacific commerce.

I submit the case to you. Is Hawaii a strategical point, or is it not?

Is it the part of good military tactics and statesmanship to keep other nations out of Hawaii, or would the United States and its commerce be as safe or safer with Hawaii in the possession of a foreign and possibly hostile power?

Is it wise to now definitely and finally secure to the American nation for all time the commanding control of the Pacific, which Clayton and Webster and Marcy strove for, and to which Grant and Seward and Blaine looked forward; or is it the course of wisdom to abandon the policy of sixty years and withdraw your claim to any special rights or interests in Hawaii?

It is a question for the American people to decide.

But, it is objected, a navy will be required to protect Hawaii if it is annexed.

If the United States can maintain peace without the possession of Hawaii, it can do so equally well if Hawaii is American territory. The fact that Hawaii is American territory will not create international friction any more than does the fact that California and Florida have become American territory.

It is as necessary to maintain a navy for the protection of the Pacific coast as it is for the protection of Hawaii; and if a navy is not necessary for the one purpose, neither is it for the other.

Again, this country has already committed itself to the policy of exclusion of other powers from Hawaii. This policy has been in the past and still is advocated by all American statesmen, both those who favor and those who oppose annexation. It will take as large a navy to keep other countries out of Hawaii independent as it will if Hawaii is American territory; no more and no less.

Having already adopted the policy of exclusion, which must be supported by force in case of war, annexation is only incidental to such policy—a method of making it more effective.

Whether annexation takes place or not the policy of exclusion exists, and this policy the United States must be prepared to defend or abandon. No one proposes to abandon it; if it is to be defended, a navy will be required to do it in case of war.

If other countries can be kept out of Hawaii by fear of the might of the United States now, such means will be equally effective after Hawaii becomes American territory.

If force becomes necessary to effectuate the exclusion policy, such force can be more effectively and economically applied if the legal title to Hawaii is vested in the American Government than if it belongs to an alien and possible hostile jurisdiction.

The continued independence of Hawaii is no guaranty that it will not, by process of natural evolution at some time, pass into the control of those who are hostile to the United States and American interests.

Again, in case of war, you will require a navy to protect your interests in the Pacific if you hold Hawaii; but it will require an infinitely greater one if you do not hold it.

Suppose, for example, that war has broken out; that Hawaii has been abandoned and taken possession of by the enemy with a fleet containing ten battle ships.

There are four principal points on the Pacific coast exposed to naval attack, to wit:

Puget Sound ports, Portland, San Francisco, and San Diego, besides many smaller ones.

The enemy's fleet at Honolulu would be within easy steaming distance of any one of these points.

The Napoleonic recipe for victory was to have more men than the enemy at a given point at a given time.

If a defensive campaign is to be fought with the coast as the line of battle, then in order to meet the enemy on equal terms even, it would be necessary to maintain a fleet of at least ten battle ships at each of the four points indicated, for there would be no way of ascertaining beforehand which would be the point of attack.

If, on the contrary, the United States holds Hawaii, a fleet of twenty ships can be stationed there and overmatch the enemy two to one.

The enemy must come to Hawaii to coal, and upon arrival there will meet an overwhelming force.

By abandoning Hawaii and making the coast the exclusive line of defense, forty ships are necessary to meet the enemy on even terms.

By holding Hawaii as an outpost, twenty ships provide an overwhelmingly superior force of two to one.

Which is the most economical?

Which policy demonstrates foresight and statesmanship?

It has been suggested that coal can be transported in colliers and transferred at sea. There are many reasons why this would be impracticable on a large scale. Imagine transshipping a whole cargo in the restless swell of midocean, to say nothing of a storm which might occur at the very time when a ship's coal had become exhausted, leaving it a helpless hulk.

Again, the speed of the fleet would be reduced to that of the slowest collier, while speed is of the utmost value to a modern navy.

Again, instead of attacking vigorously, the first duty of the fleet would be to stand by and protect the colliers, for their destruction, or even their dispersion by storm, would render the fleet helpless and end in its surrender or destruction.

Again, the effect of modern guns is so terrific that after any serious engagement it is necessary to dry dock every ship engaged therein for repairs. What opportunity would there be for this with the nearest dock on the opposite side of the Pacific?

Naval experts declare this proposition wholly impracticable under the conditions presented.

But there are those who believe that the days of war are past. They remember Washington's warning against entangling alliances, but forget that he also said that "to be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace."

It is gravely argued that the best naval policy of the United States is "to sell its Navy and go out of the navy business." It was Washington again who said:

"To secure respect to a neutral flag requires a naval force organized and ready to vindicate it from insult or aggression; that may even prevent the necessity of going to war."

It was President John Adams who said:

"Naval power is the natural defense of the United States."

And President John Quincy Adams said:

"A military marine is the only arm by which our power can be estimated or felt by foreign nations. . . . The gradual increase of the Navy is the introduction of a system to act upon the character and history of our country for an indefinite series of ages."

It was President Andrew Jackson who said:

"No nation, however desirous of peace, can hope to escape collisions with other powers. . . . Our local situation . . . points to the Navy as our natural means of defense. . . . It is your true policy, for . . . it will give to defense its greatest efficiency by meeting danger at a distance from home. . . . We shall more certainly preserve peace when it is well understood that we are prepared for war."

President Grant said:

"With an energetic, progressive, business people like ours, penetrating and forming business relations with every part of the known world, a Navy strong enough to command the respect of our flag abroad is necessary for the full protection of all their rights."

Such quotations might be multiplied indefinitely. Were these men also blind leaders of the blind?

Were they seeking promotion, or were they victims of ignorance?

Abolish the Navy!

Not Alexander, Caesar, nor Napoleon ever commanded such armies in time of war as are now maintained in time of peace, and the nations are increasing their armament at a rate never before known since the world began.

Does any American citizen outside of the insane asylum and the doctrinaires camp believe that the day has arrived when either "international law or the justice of a cause can be depended upon for a fair settlement of international differences, with a strong political necessity or desire on the one side opposed to comparative weakness on the other?"

England in the Transvaal and northern India, in Venezuela and Nicaragua; France in Madagascar and Siam; Germany in Haiti, and all Europe in China, are answers enough to the question.

Does anyone hear of arbitration treaties between strong and weak powers, except when, as in the case of Venezuela, the weak party is supported by a greater one?

In the recent controversy between Hawaii and Japan, when the former proposed arbitration, the reply was:

"Arbitration can not be invoked where a nation's honor is involved. This is a question which can only be settled by the strongest arm and the strongest ship;" and it was not until American guns in the harbor of Honolulu outnumbered those of Japan by 3 to 1, and a warning tone was heard from Washington, that the beauties of arbitration were fully appreciated in Yokohama.

Abolish the Navy!

Have Americans forgotten the time when, with a merchant marine rivaling that of England, it abolished the Navy and paid little Portugal an annual subsidy to protect American ships in the Mediterranean, and continued to do so until England prohibited Portugal from doing it any longer?

Have they forgotten that this great and free country paid annual tribute to an African potentate, to hire him not to pillage and burn American ships and murder and enslave American citizens, and actually presented him at public cost with a full-rigged ship, which he proceeded to man with slaves captured from American vessels?

Is there any American patriot who does not thrill with a sense of shame at the recollection, and burn with resentment at the proposition to revert to the status which made it possible?

President Cleveland and President McKinley have both stated that the time might arrive when the conditions would require American intervention in Cuba; and the Spanish authorities have passionately declared that they would not submit to it.

Suppose that the United States does intervene and a Spanish fleet appears off New York Harbor, and suppose that you have no navy. What would you do?

Send them an essay on arbitration by Carl Schurz?

I do not know what else you would do, unless you sent them a copy of the New York Evening Post demonstrating the iniquity and uselessness of a navy.

I do not predict war, but I call your attention to the fact that, in the words of Mahan, "It is not necessary to acquire territory beyond the sea in order to become involved in international complications."

"Without political ambitions outside the continent, the commercial enterprises of the American people are being brought into violent antagonism with vital interests of foreign belligerent states."

Look at the developments of the day. It is common knowledge that production has so exceeded the domestic power of consumption that foreign markets must be had or stagnation and distress will follow.

It is common knowledge that the same conditions exist in Europe to a still greater degree.

It is common knowledge that this country is now competing destructively with the producers of the world; so destructively that within the last few weeks we have heard Goluchowski, the Austrian minister of foreign affairs, calling upon Europe to combine in a "politic-commercial war" against the common foe, America, prophesying that if such action were not taken at once, another and bloodier war would be necessary to preserve the political and commercial institutions of Europe.

Where are your foreign markets to be found? In Europe? To a limited extent; but Europe is not your natural market for manufactured products.

It manufactures the same things that you do. Europe is your natural rival, not your natural customer.

In 1882 William H. Seward, on the floor of the United States Senate, said: "Henceforth European commerce, politics, thought, and activity, although actually gaining force, and European connections, although actually becoming more intimate, will, nevertheless, relatively sink in importance; while the Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast region beyond will become the chief theater of events in the world's great hereafter."

That prophecy is rapidly being fulfilled.

But ten years ago the Pacific coast of Siberia was an icebound wilderness and Vladivostok an unknown village. To-day Vladivostok is a city of 40,000 people, with wharves, dry docks, warehouses, and fortifications equal to those of any port in the world. The Pacific terminus of the trans-Siberian railroad to St. Petersburg, it is the growing center of a commerce the variety and volume of which can not be foretold. This railroad is being pushed by all the mighty power of the Russian Government. For a hundred years Russia has vainly sought an open road to the sea by way of the Dardanelles. She is now achieving that object by way of the Pacific. Within the past year she has obtained a right of way from China for a second terminus to her railroad at Port Arthur, a port that is never frozen up. Therein is foreshadowed the Russian absorption of northern China, for the Russian Bear never lets go of its grip.

Within three years Japan has evolved from a comparatively unimportant to a world nation. With her upward of 50,000,000 people, and a navy growing faster than any other except that of Great Britain, she will hereafter be a prime factor in the problems and commerce of the Pacific.

With the shaking up which Japan gave China, and the disintegrating influences from within and without now apparent, the three hundred millions of China will soon be open wide to the commerce of the world.

The Asiatic countries facing upon the Pacific Ocean are inhabited by one-fourth of the consuming population of the world, while Hongkong is already the second shipping port of the world.

Australia, New Zealand, and the thousands of South Sea Islands, now under European control, are all developing with marvelous rapidity and are at the threshold of an era of greatness undreamt of by the northern world.

At present the commerce of the United States with the nations of the Pacific is hampered by the great cost of railroad transportation across the continent and the distance around Cape Horn; but with the opening of the isthmian canal the supplies of food and cotton produced by the Gulf States and the great Mississippi Valley and the manufactures of the central and eastern portions of the country will, for all practical purposes, be as near to the Pacific markets as is now the coast of California.

No man can form any reliable estimate of the immensity of the commerce that will pour across the Pacific within the next twenty-five years. Every pound and every yard of these exports must pass by the door of Hawaii. Hawaii will become the great central entrepôt of western commerce, from which will radiate north, south, east, and west an innumerable fleet of merchant ships and steamers, almost every one of which will necessarily stop there for coal and supplies.

The control of Hawaii by the United States will guarantee for all time that this great commerce shall be free and unhampered by foreign surveillance or interference.

Any foreign nation in control of Hawaii, even though at peace with the United States, would be in a position to hamper American commerce to the point of extinction by port and customs regulations.

It may be that the arguments of those who oppose annexation are correct. It may be that the United States will never again go to war or need a navy. It may be that no foreign country will ever interfere with its commerce or the rights of citizens in the Pacific. It may be that human nature has mellowed and changed and that precedents do not apply; but in view of the disastrous consequences to American interests, in case these suggestions are not correct, is it not well to be reasonably prepared for whatever emergencies may present themselves?

You do not expect to die to-morrow or that your house will burn next week, and yet you insure both. If this is wise policy for the individual, why is it not for a collection of individuals? If for the citizen, why not for the nation? I submit to you in all earnestness that, whether you will or no, the American nation is being forced by the evolution of the age into relations with foreign countries and peoples which must make it an international and not an insular nation, compelling it to accept or provide for the responsibilities and obligations as well as the advantages of that status. In no portion of the world is this international character of its relations and interests being so rapidly or so largely developed as in or about the Pacific.

Whether the arguments of those who favor annexation are right or whether they are wrong, I submit that there is enough demonstrated in favor of their arguments to make the annexation policy a sound and statesmanlike one as a measure of national insurance.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman to withhold that motion for a moment.

EVENING SESSION TUESDAY.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, when the hour of 5 o'clock shall arrive, the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, and remain in session from 8 o'clock until half past 10 for the purpose of debate only upon this measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that at 5 o'clock to-morrow a recess be taken until 8 o'clock, and that the session continue from 8 o'clock until 10.30 for the purpose of debate only on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BERING SEA AWARD.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent to consider the following bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10682) making appropriations to pay the Bering Sea awards.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10682) making an appropriation to pay the Bering Sea awards. Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the President to pay to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the commissioners appointed pursuant to the stipulations of the convention of February 8, 1896, between the United States and Great Britain, providing for the settlement of the claims presented by the latter against the former in virtue of the convention of February 29, 1892, the sum of $473,151.35 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This appropriation is made without the admission that any liability exists for any loss of prospective profits to British vessels engaged in pelagic fur-sealing, or for interest on the sums awarded to Great Britain, and without admitting the authority of the arbitrators to make any award on the basis of damages for the arrest or detention of vessels not included in the submission contained in the treaty.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement, and if there is to be any objection—

Mr. SULZER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear a statement from the gentleman from Illinois regarding this bill.

Mr. CANNON. This is an award made in pursuance of a commission created by act of Congress, and the amount has been found due. I do not care to discuss the justice or injustice or the propriety or impropriety of the award.

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question—

Mr. CANNON. In a minute. A joint commission was made by arrangement between Great Britain and the United States, and this is the award in pursuance of the submission to the commission. Now, then, already the sundry civil bill carries this item. It was passed by the House and has been agreed to by the House; but the sundry civil bill, having other items upon it, can not practically be enacted between this and the 17th of this month. By the terms of the award made in pursuance of the submission, this money is found due on the 17th of this month; and this joint resolution is proposed in pursuance of the urgent request of the State Department, that that may be properly met, as it should be met, under the award made as I have indicated.

Mr. TERRY. I will ask the gentleman if this is not the same claim that he fought so vigorously in the last Congress?

Mr. CANNON. No, sir; it is not the same claim. During the last Congress a proposition was made to settle this claim for four hundred and odd thousand dollars. I was opposed to that settlement. I did not believe then that it ought to be paid, and it was rejected by Congress.

Mr. TERRY. Has there not been—

Mr. CANNON. But as it has been submitted, being a matter of debt, when the treaty had referred it to a commission and the commission have made the award, I am estopped from combating its justice; and it only remains for us to pay the award of the commission that was created by law.

Mr. PEARSON. Is it not a matter of national honor?

Mr. CANNON. Whether I fought it or not makes no difference so far as the merit is concerned.

Mr. TERRY. Was it at that time recommended by the President?

Mr. CANNON (continuing). That is not to be determined by my wisdom or unwisdom.

Mr. TERRY. I am not making any point that it is to be determined by your wisdom or unwisdom, but I want to get at the facts. At the time it passed here before the President and the British Government had agreed on the matter, had they not?

Mr. CANNON. There was an agreement made, or suggestion made, that the amount could be settled for about the amount of this award.

Mr. TERRY. Was not that about as binding upon us as this?

Mr. CANNON. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. TERRY. There is no way to get out of this at all, as I understand.

Mr. CANNON. This is an award made by a commission created by act of Congress upon the part of our Government, a joint commission, and the award has been made.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman allow me for one moment? As I understand the question, the commission that met at Paris with reference to the disagreement had with Great Britain about the seals, etc., provided that a commission should be appointed to ascertain these damages, so that it becomes a part of the original transaction creating the commission between England and this country, and the honor of the country is pledged to pay the award of the commission instituted by that first commission that was organized.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if, in his judgment, he does not think we got the worst of this arbitration?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, that is purely a matter of judgment. I will say to my friend that it is not necessary to discuss that question. I will say to him further that judgments and decrees are constantly rendered by courts that are not according to my sense of propriety; and I have resorted on such occasions to "cussing the court" [laughter]; but, after all, the judgments have to be paid.

Mr. SULZER. That is this case exactly. I think we should have an opportunity to "cuss the court" in regard to this award.

For one, I believe that it is an unfair and an unjust award to the people of this country. We generally get the worst of an arbitration with Great Britain. But this award is one of the worst in the history of the country.

Mr. CANNON. And still the award is made. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, the history of the matter is briefly this: Under the arbitration between the United States and the British Government during the Administration of General Harrison, our Government became bound to pay such damages as might be awarded for damages to Canadian fishermen in Bering Sea.

When Mr. Cleveland was elected President the second time, with the award of the commission resting upon his Administration, his Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, and the British minister reached an agreement by which a certain amount of money should be paid to those who were so damaged. The amount was presented to Congress and was placed on the general deficiency bill. It was less than this appropriation.

The opposition, however, was so great that the House refused to recognize the agreement. I thought then that the House was acting unwisely, and the result shows that it did act unwisely. Therefore it became necessary to appoint commissioners between the two Governments. Those commissioners met and rendered the present award. This House had already voted to pay the award. The appropriation for the purpose passed the House some days since, but inasmuch as the agreement required that it should be paid on the 17th of this month, and it will be impossible for the sundry civil bill to become a law by the time designated, the resolution presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] becomes necessary.

Mr. BRUCKER. This item is already in the sundry civil bill, is it?

Mr. SAYERS. It is; and if the House should refuse to pass the resolution, the award will nevertheless be paid through the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has the item in the sundry civil bill been agreed to by the Senate?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; by both the Senate and the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the item is not in conference?

Mr. SAYERS. It is not in conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the bill be considered at the present time? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make one remark. The proposed settlement between the Secretary of State and the British minister was rejected by Congress. Under the treaty a joint commission was had, and this is the award, and whether it was proper or improper, whether we were overreached or not, we have had our day in court, so to express it, and this amount has been fixed, and should be paid. Now I ask that the bill be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TUESDAY, June 14, 1898.

Prayer by Rev. FRANK M. BRISTOL, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. H. L. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10682) making an appropriation to pay the Bering Sea awards; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 4740) to provide American registers for the steamers Victoria, Olympia, Arizona, Columbia, Argyle, and Tacoma;

A bill (S. 4749) to provide an American register for the steamer Arkadia;

A bill (H. R. 378) granting an increase of pension to Lowell H. Hopkinson;

A bill (H. R. 4488) granting an increase of pension to Peter Castle; and

A bill (H. R. 10220) to organize a hospital corps of the Navy of the United States, to define its duties and regulate its pay.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the petition of O. A. Fleming and 65 other citizens of Exeter, N. H., urging the need of sufficient and permanent harbor fortifications for the defense of the waters of Piscataqua, and requesting that an appropriation of $100,000 be made at once available for that purpose. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of sundry citizens of Missouri, praying Congress that instead of issuing bonds and increasing taxes it exercise its constitutional power and issue noninterest-bearing, full legal-tender Treasury notes with which to pay the expenses of the war with Spain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 3117) to increase the pension of Robert Wilkinson;

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 4191) to readjust the boundary of the National Zoological Park and preserve its seclusion between Park road on the east and Cincinnati street and Connecticut avenue on the west; and

A bill (S. 4457) to provide for the establishment of building lines on certain streets in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

PRINTING OF WAR REVENUE ACT.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives proposing to print 48,000 copies of the act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, to report it with amendments, and I ask immediate action.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "sixty-eight;" after the word "printed," in line 6, to insert "with paper covers and index;" and after the word "Senate," in line 8, to insert "and 20,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue," so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That 68,000 copies of an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," be printed with paper covers and index, 32,000 copies for the use of the House and 16,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 20,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ALLISON, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved. That there be printed for the immediate use of the Senate 2,000 copies of the "Act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," with paper covers and index, said copies to be delivered to the Senate document room.

QUARTERMASTER'S SUPPLIES.

Mr. HAWLEY. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report a brief bill, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The bill (S. 4764) to repeal so much of the act approved July 31, 1876, as forbids publishing in the District of Columbia certain advertisements for contracts was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of July 31, 1876, as provides that "in no case of advertisement for contracts for the public service shall the same be published in any newspaper printed and published in the District of Columbia, unless the supplies or labor covered by such advertisement are to be furnished or performed in said District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. The supplies for the large body of troops in the vicinity of the District are purchased in the markets around here, and the officers are forbidden by this ancient law, for some reason I do not understand, to advertise in the newspapers of the District; so they advertise in Alexandria and Baltimore, while the supplies are almost wholly obtained in Washington. They wish simply the privilege of advertising here.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CANNON introduced a bill (S. 4765) granting a pension to Sarah A. Erb; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTUS introduced a bill (S. 4766) granting to the Muscle Shoals Power Company right to erect and construct canal and power stations at Muscle Shoals, Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 4767) granting a pension to Sarah E. Stubbs; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4768) granting a pension to Joseph Winchester; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. QUAY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 174) for the relief of Ex-Naval Cadet S. A. W. Patterson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. QUAY. While I have the floor, the Senate would exceedingly oblige me if they would permit me to call up, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 1516) to incorporate the National Association of Manufacturers. It is a corporation in which there is no capital and no special powers, and the bill will be entirely unobjectionable. I have been waiting for some weeks for an opportunity to have it passed. I ask that the bill be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask what committee reported the bill?

Mr. QUAY. It is reported from the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BERRY. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. QUAY. I send the report to the desk to be read. I do not know whether it is a unanimous report or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire to have the report read?

Mr. BERRY. I think the bill had better go over until to-morrow morning. I do not understand it and a number of others here do not, and I should like to know what it is.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection at all to the bill going over. If the Secretary will read the report it will give the Senator information in regard to the bill.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. MASON May 6, 1898, as follows:

The Committee on Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1516) to incorporate the National Association of Manufacturers, submit the following report:

The object of this bill is to form a corporation, not for profit, but simply to promote the manufacturing industries of the United States and to give proper direction to the efforts looking to that end, and also to extend the facilities of transportation both at home and abroad, and generally to take all proper methods for advancing the manufacturing interests and promoting the commerce of the whole country. The officers selected and provided for in the bill are the present officers of the National Association of Manufacturers, and consist of well-known citizens interested in manufacturing in more than half the States of the Union; and it is believed the adoption of this bill will give a national character to the association that will aid it in its laudable and proper undertakings, and for that reason your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. QUAY. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that this association is already in existence and that the object of this legislation is merely to give it a corporate character. It has no capital and will have no profits and dividends. However, if the Senator wishes to examine the bill I have no objection at all to its going over.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to have it go over. I have never been inclined to vote for charters of any character by the National Government. I should like to look into the bill. Of course, the Senator from Pennsylvania understands it is simply because I desire to see what is in the bill.

Mr. QUAY. Let the bill go over in order that Senators who desire to examine the proposition may have time to do so and to vote intelligently upon it, but I have been waiting for some time endeavoring to bring the bill to the attention of the Senate, and I should be very glad if, by unanimous consent, Senators would permit me to call it up to hear their determination upon it after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. BERRY. I do not ask to have it go over longer than to-morrow morning.

Mr. QUAY. Let that be the understanding.

Mr. TELLER. I do not wish to be committed to to-morrow morning as far as I am concerned. Let the bill go over without any particular time being specified.

Mr. QUAY. I wish to have an opportunity to call it up soon.
Mr. TELLER. The Senator can call the bill up at any time, I suppose. I do not wish to give it any particular status, that is all. I do not object to the Senator calling up the bill when he gets ready, but I do not want it to be made an order for tomorrow morning, or anything of that kind.

Mr. QUAY. I would be exceedingly glad to have an opportunity to call it up to-morrow. I have been waiting to call it up for some time.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to withhold the report now and make the report again to-morrow morning as he makes it now. Then he will have an opportunity to make the request for immediate consideration just as he has done at this time.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Massachusetts will understand that I am not reporting the bill. It was favorably reported some time ago by the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. We can not hear on this side what is going on upon the other.

Mr. QUAY. I merely asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed now to its consideration, to which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] objected. I hope the Senator will allow me to have the bill taken up and considered to-morrow.

REPORT ON TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That House report 4165, second session Fiftieth Congress, be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

NAVAL RETIRED LIST.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask consent to call up the bill (S. 2059) to authorize a retired list for enlisted men and appointed petty officers of the United States Navy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to add the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That applicants for retirement under this act, as far as the Navy is concerned, shall, unless physically disqualified for service, be at least 50 years of age.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That when an enlisted man or appointed petty officer has served as such thirty years in the United States Navy, either as an enlisted man or petty officer, or both, he shall, by making application to the President, be placed on the retired list hereby created, with the rank held by him at the date of retirement; and he shall thereafter receive 75 per cent of the pay and allowances of the rank or rating upon which he was retired: Provided, That if said enlisted man or appointed petty officer had active war service in the Navy or in the Army or Marine Corps, either as volunteer or regular, during the war of the rebellion, such war service shall be computed as double time in computing the thirty years necessary to entitle him to be retired: And provided further, That applicants for retirement under this act, as far as the Navy is concerned, shall, unless physically disqualified for service, be at least 50 years of age.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PLUMBING AND GAS-FITTING REGULATIONS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6954) to regulate plumbing and gas fitting in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HUBERT NYSEN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3795) for the relief of Hubert Nysen.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert "less any discount that may have been allowed," and at the end of the bill to insert:

Provided, however, That no payment shall be made hereunder until the said stamps are delivered to the Secretary uncancelled, with satisfactory proof that they have never been used in settlement of any tax or demand of the Government.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, Hubert Nysen, of Shakopee, Minn., the sum of $125, less any discount that may have been allowed, to reimburse him for stamps inadvertently purchased by him from the United States as a wholesale dealer in malt liquors, which stamps have not been used by him, but still remain wholly unused and uncancelled. That the sum of $125 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of making the payment aforesaid: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made hereunder until the said stamps are delivered to the Secretary uncancelled, with satisfactory proof that they have never been used in settlement of any tax or demand of the Government.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES T. RADER.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4340) for the relief of Charles T. Rader.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "unappropriated," to insert the word "nonmineral;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles T. Rader, of Fort Logan, Mont., be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to select by legal subdivisions, at such place or places as he may desire in the State of Montana, 480 acres of unoccupied and unappropriated nonmineral public lands, and when such selection shall be by him certified to the Secretary of the Interior patent shall be issued to said Rader for the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10293) to incorporate the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERING SEA AWARDS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill which came over this morning from the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 10682) making an appropriation to pay the Bering Sea awards; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be placed upon its passage. I will state, if necessary, the reasons for it, though I think they are well known.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read the second time at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the President to pay to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the commissioners appointed pursuant to the stipulations of the convention of February 8, 1856, between the United States and Great Britain, providing for the settlement of the claims presented by the latter against the former in virtue of the convention of February 29, 1892, the sum of $473,151.26 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This appropriation is made without the admission that any liability exists for any loss of prospective profits to British vessels engaged in pelagic fur sealing, or for interest on the sums awarded to Great Britain, and without admitting the authority of the arbitrators to make any award on the basis of damages for the arrest or detention of vessels not included in the submission contained in the treaty.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PETTUS. I inquire if that bill has been reported by a committee of the Senate since it came from the House of Representatives?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been taken up by unanimous consent, and has not been reported by a committee.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Alabama will listen to me a moment, I think I can explain the situation regarding the bill in a way satisfactory to him. This is for the payment of the Bering Sea awards.

Mr. PETTUS. I heard the bill read.

Mr. ALLISON. The provision of this bill is contained in the sundry civil appropriation bill which passed the Senate some time ago and which was unanimously agreed to. Those awards must be paid on the 16th of this month, which is now very near at hand, and it is impossible for the sundry civil bill to be completed by that time, owing to other differences, not to differences respecting this particular item. The House of Representatives last evening passed this bill covering an appropriation for this sum, in order that we may meet our obligations at the time provided for in the treaty. The Senator's colleague [Mr. MORGAN] is very familiar with this whole subject, and it is very important that the bill should pass to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no doubt of that. I would ask the Senator from Iowa if the same language is retained in this bill as in the amendment which was adopted to the sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Precisely the same language.

Mr. MORGAN. It is proper, then, and the bill ought to pass. The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GALEN E. GREEN.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6460) for the relief of Galen E. Green.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize Galen E. Green to close Cuvier street, and directs that all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the street by virtue of any act done or record made by or on behalf of said Green shall be released, granted, and conveyed to Green, his heirs and assigns in fee simple.

Mr. QUAY. That seems to be a peculiar bill, and I should be glad to have an explanation of it from some member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEWART. There was a narrow street opened in a subdivision which this man made, which should never have been opened, but it was in the plat he filed and has been approved. There are buildings on it now, and it does not conform to the plan of the city. There should not be a street there under the plan. The bill passed the House of Representatives, and the District Commissioners recommend that the street be closed up and abandoned.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUT. COMMANDER R. M. G. BROWN.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 8701) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Lieut. Commander R. M. G. Brown, now on the retired list, to be a commander on the retired list.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Does that bill come from the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. PERKINS. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs and that there is an amendment striking out the preamble.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I wished to inquire about. I think it very unwise to make such recitals in the preambles of bills unless in very peculiar cases.

Mr. PERKINS. That was the opinion of the committee, and the committee therefore recommended that the preamble be stricken out.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. There is an amendment reported by the committee. The closing clause of the report of the committee is as follows:

The facts show that this case is, indeed, one of peculiar merit; and your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the preamble, and that, as thus amended, it be passed.

I therefore now offer that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That being an amendment to the preamble, it will not be in order until after the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. I now move to amend by striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

CLAIM OF THE METHODIST BOOK CONCERN SOUTH.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for; and the Chair lays before the Senate resolution No. 382, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the resolution been read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 9th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire and report to whom the money was paid under the claim of the Methodist Book Concern South; and also as to all circumstances connected with the passage of the bill providing for the payment of said claim, and with the subsequent payment of the money under said act of Congress.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I have a few words further to say in reference to this matter before it comes to a vote. There seemed to be such a persistent effort made yesterday to put me in a wrong position on this subject, that I desire to add to what I have said heretofore, although I think I have very clearly made known my position and think that the Senate fully understands it; but there seemed to have been a malicious effort made yesterday to show that I had endeavored to deceive the Senate; that I was derelict in some way or committed some improper act in connection with this matter, and so I wish to put upon the record a few further statements of facts in this connection.

I used all possible diligence at the time the bill was under discussion and put the Senate in possession of the exact situation with reference to the rumors which were floating about the Senate Chamber and about the Capitol. I gave the Senate all the facts that I had been able to obtain. I wrote to the Book Agents and asked them to make a full statement in connection with the matter. My letter is in the RECORD. I got two telegrams from them, both of which are also in the RECORD. There are other statements of a similar character made by other Senators, and the Senate in its action was influenced not alone by an opinion of mine, not alone by any statement of mine, but also by the statements which were made through me and other Senators in connection with the matter.

I call attention to the remarks of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made at the time, and I think they embody the opinions of Senators generally upon the subject when the bill was passed and show the influences under which the Senate acted. The Senator from Massachusetts said:

Mr. HOAR. The member of the House of Representatives from that district informs me and authorizes me to say that the gentlemen who have charge of this claim are the Rev. Dr. Barbee, a clergyman of eminent and high and pure character, and Mr. Smith, a layman, but a man also devoted to religious work, being superintendent of a Sunday school and active in its management. They are the Book Agents, so called, and they have both personally informed him that no money has been expended and there is no outstanding debt or obligation for any such service.

Then I stated that the telegram which I had just read was from those gentlemen, the Book Agents. The Senator from Massachusetts then said:

Mr. HOAR. Very well; my addition to it is the simple statement of the member who is their neighbor and friend.

I ought not to have interrupted the Senator from Maine for this purpose, but I wish to suggest that it seems to me it is a pretty serious affront to men of high character and standing, representing a concern of high standing, to put into a bill a proviso that they have not traded with claim agents and lobbyists, after that assertion on their part.

Mr. President, with those facts before us, other Senators were influenced as was the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senate decided to pay this claim, and decided that no amendment like that suggested by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was necessary or proper; and the bill passed under those circumstances.

There was no agency on my part, direct or indirect, to deceive the Senate. There can be no agency in wrongdoing. All are principals in wrongdoing; there is no such thing as an agency in such a connection; and when it was stated yesterday by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that I was an agent deceiving the Senate he did himself great injustice in making a statement that had so little foundation in it, a statement that was actually free from the principle of truth. I put in the RECORD yesterday my views and statement in connection with that, and I renew and repeat them here now, so that there may be no mistake as to what his remarks implied or to the way in which I met them.

It was stated also by the Senator from New Hampshire that I proposed in the remarks which I made to the Senate a few days ago that nothing should be done. I thought if he had listened to the remarks which I made at the time he would have known that I very clearly indicated my views that an investigation could properly be made. But, Mr. President, the charges are not yet proven. They are at present only charges. I said the other day that I feared they were true; and the telegram which was read yesterday, addressed to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], strengthens me in the belief or fear that these charges are true. Their telegram seems like a plea of confession and avoidance. As they have noticed the action which is going on here, my sincere regret is that they were not able to telegraph back promptly that the statements which had been here presented, which were damaging to their good name and their reputation as truthful men, were false; that the telegrams which they sent to me contained the truth; and that no such sum of money was paid as alleged to this claim agent. There is, however, no such denial. They only ask us to suspend judgment and to refrain from comment. But we have not arrived at a time when judgment is to be pronounced upon this matter. We have only entered upon the preliminary stages. We propose to authorize a committee to determine the facts, and then, when those facts are determined and presented to the Senate, it will be time for us to pronounce our judgment.

I still shall be very much gratified, Mr. President, to find that the facts are not as stated; but if they are true, then will come the time for us to determine what course the Senate is to take. I stated in my remarks that the United States Government and the people of the United States had not been wronged in this matter, and I still adhere to that view.

The report that was made upon the bill to the Senate based the claim upon the idea that the sum mentioned in the bill was actually due to this fund. I read from the closing words of that report:

But this case appeals not only to the generosity of the Government, but to a sentiment of justice. The publishing house was the largest printing establishment south of New York at the beginning of the late war, excepting only the Government Printing Office at Washington; its use was of great importance to the Government; a vast amount of printing was done there at a large saving to the Treasury, and the payment of the sum proposed in the bill will be a fair reimbursement to the claimants for the use and consumption of their property.

Under all the circumstances of the case, the committee recommend the payment of the claim and recommend that the bill do pass.

That was the report of the committee, and the recommendation was indorsed when the Senate passed the bill. But, Mr. President, I am well aware that some Senators did not accept that view, and that they were acting in a generous manner toward the publishing house in paying this claim, not as a strictly legal one, but in a liberal spirit they thought, in view of all the circumstances, that the amount should be paid; and they were influenced by such a spirit, but the claim no doubt would have been paid and the bill would have been passed whether it was understood that any large amount was to go to a claim agent or not. As I said in my remarks a few days ago, the only difference would have been that we should have tried, by a suitable amendment to protect the beneficiaries of this trust in whose interest we passed the bill from the action of their trustees in paying out an unreasonable amount to this claim agent.

It does not follow, as a matter of course, that there would be any obligation on the part of the officials of the church to order that this money should be paid back, but all those questions are in the future, and they will be determined when we come to pass our judgment upon the facts of the case.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am not concerned so much about what is to be done with reference to the money; I am one of those who regret very much the growing power of money in this country. If its power is so great in the section in which I live as to induce these trustees to make representations to the Senate which are misleading or false in order to recover a large amount of money, or to influence this wealthy man who acted as their agent to take from this fund an unreasonable amount for his own private purposes, when the body of the fund belongs to the church and its earnings to the widows and children and the old preachers who have served the church in the days of their usefulness, it has made greater advances than I had supposed, and its influence is to be deplored. It is a matter of very great and sincere regret and mortification if any body of men in the section of country in which I live have allowed themselves to be placed in a position where such charges can be established against them.

I think, then, Mr. President, that it will be sufficient for us to pass the resolution at present, and to ascertain the facts. If they are true, the report will be presented to the Senate, and it will be for the Senate then to determine what action shall be taken; but I think there is a still greater obligation upon the church officials, the college of bishops, or whoever else direct the general affairs of the church—I think there is a greater call upon them than upon the Senate to have an investigation of the conduct of their book agents made either during our investigation or prior or subsequent to it, so that they may ascertain whether there has been any wrongdoing in their church that requires correction or discipline.

The Southern Methodist Church is not the subject of these accusations. If high officials in that church have gone wrong, there is a power there to investigate their conduct, and the church will know what judgment to pass upon them if they have been guilty of deceit or misrepresentation. I have full faith in the integrity of its leading officials to direct and manage its affairs, and believe they will deal with any guilty officials who have departed from their line of duty and who have wasted a fund which it was their solemn duty to protect.

Now, Mr. President, let this investigation be made. I wish to see all the facts brought out. As I said before when I addressed the Senate, so far as I am concerned I will do all in my power to aid the Senate in getting possession of everything that is properly connected with the case.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I should not have felt called upon to again address the Senate upon this resolution had it not been for what I understood to be an expression of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to the effect that I had yesterday maliciously misrepresented the action of Senators.

Mr. President, I did not intend yesterday to deal in an unkind spirit with any Senator who voted for or advocated the original appropriation. I am sure nothing could have been further from my thought than to say anything unkind or displeasing to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE]. I did think that, considering the assurances, if I may use that word without offense—the assurances that had been given to the Senators that there was no fee to be paid in this case, there ought now to be something more than discussion of the subject. I did think, to be precise, that the Senators, possibly the Senate by direct action, ought to induce the Methodist Book Company to sue for and endeavor to recover back this money from Mr. Stahlman. My thoughts did not go so far as those of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] or the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I did not go so far as to say that I thought either $188,000 or the $288,000 ought to be returned to the Treasury of the United States. I only thought that the Methodist Book Company, whose agents could not legally have made any such contract as was put in force, ought to pursue the money and recover it back into their own treasury for such action thereafter as they might deem it expedient to take.

Now, that was all I intended to say. I was not aware that the Senator from Florida was so sensitive as he appeared to be, and I was not aware that any Senators were sensitive on this subject or thought that any person would venture to attribute to any one of them any blame or fault in the matter. Having said so much, however, I will venture further to say that the assurances which were given to the Senate on the inquiry made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and which resulted in the motion of the Senator from Indiana to table the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, were very broad. The Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], on page 2600 of the RECORD of March 8, 1898, said of the charge that a fee was to be paid:

I was thoroughly satisfied that the report had no foundation whatever in fact.

Later he said:

I made the statement fully in the letter, which set forth that some agents here would get a very large percentage of the amount. I knew that was not possible, because they had no authority to make such a bargain.

The Senator also said:

I am satisfied that there is no foundation whatever for the report.

Again he said that he hoped the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would not be offered, and added:

And I can assure the Senate that there is no necessity whatever for the amendment.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said he did not think it was a fair occasion for anyone to "rake up technical points" for the purpose of defeating a bill of this character. A little later, when the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] asked, "How does an attorney come into the case at all?" the RECORD shows this:

Mr. MORGAN and others. There is no attorney.

The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] gave similar assurances, and the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] said:

Where I live and in that whole section of the country there is not a respectable lawyer who would dare to charge anything for any service rendered to a church.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] said:

We have every assurance that no fees are to be paid.

Mr. President, there is the record, and there would not have been any criticism at all of me if I had only used the right word in speaking of what had happened. I am sorry that I did not use the right word, so that the Senator from Florida would not have found it necessary to tell me that my statement was false, which was, of course, a very brave thing to say, but after all not polite, in this body. The amenities of life should not be disregarded in the Senate of the United States, and gentlemen in this body should not use language here which they would not use anywhere else.

Fortunately, I have found the word I ought to have used. I said the Senator from Florida was an agent. He denied that he had had any agency, either direct or indirect, in deceiving the Senate. This is the record: He said on the 9th of June that the assurance was made that there was no contract existing to pay a fee, and that the statement that was made was made by him:

That statement was made through me. It came from the Book Agents themselves, and as I was the medium of this communication, it is proper that I should say something in reference to the matter now that it has been brought up by the Senator from Massachusetts.

There is the proper word. Singularly enough, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who ought to have been a little more indignant than he has been about this fee, as he was the Senator who first called it to the attention of Senators, seemed to think that I was "hounding" Senators. He used that not very polite word yesterday. I do not think anybody but the Senator from South Carolina would think that was a fair description of my speech. The Senator from South Carolina, when he spoke of the transaction, was obliged to use another word because the word I had used was objectionable. I said "agent." The Senator from South Carolina said:

These gentlemen, Senators BATE and PASCO, have not deceived anybody, so far as I can see, but they have been made the medium of deceiving the Senate as to the fee to be paid the attorneys.

There, again, is the word I ought to have used. I have looked it up in the dictionary to see what it means. This is from the Century Dictionary:

Medium.

2. Anything which serves or acts intermediately; something by means of which an action is performed or an effect produced; an intervening agency or instrumentality.

3. A person through whom, or through whose agency, another acts; specifically, one who is supposed to be controlled in speech and action by the will of another person or a disembodied being, as an animal magnetism and spiritualism; an instrument for the manifestation of another personality.

That is the Century Dictionary. The Imperial Dictionary says:

Medium.

2. Something intervening and also serving as a means of transmission or communication; necessary means of motion or action; instrumentality of communication; agency of transmission that by or through which anything is accomplished, conveyed, or carried on; agency; instrumentality.

Specifically (a) a person through whom the action of another being is said to be manifested and transmitted by animal magnetism, or a person through whom spiritual manifestations are claimed to be made, especially one who is said to be capable of holding intercourse with the spirits of the deceased. Some mediums claim to have the power of floating in and moving through the air, of raising tables from the ground and keeping them suspended, and of performing many other supernatural feats.

Mr. President, I wish to substitute for the word "agent" and the word "agency" simply the statement that the Senator from Florida was the medium—being all that this word implies—of communicating the wicked contrivances of Messrs. Stahlman and Barbee & Smith to the Senate. If they claim that they were in a trance when they did it, that they were as innocent of any wrongdoing or intentional wrongdoing or even of any consciousness of what they were doing as any spiritual medium whatever, I will admit that is true; and I really wish, in the interest of peace and harmony and so that the Senator from Florida might have omitted to be so very unkind and uncivil to me yesterday, that I had used the words "medium of communication." Then all would have been peace and happiness, and the Methodist Book Concern and Mr. Stahlman would have kept the money just the same.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire seems to have laughed himself out of the false charge he made, and I am glad that he has withdrawn it. I wish to read again the sentence containing the remark which he made to which I objected; and I am satisfied that every honorable gentleman will agree that I had good cause to complain when he used such remarks in connection with my name. On page 5803 of the RECORD he said:

But, Mr. President, my only point is that the subject is not to be dismissed either in this body or in the public forum of conscience by the Senator from Florida, who admits that he helped to deceive the Senate.

When that charge was made against me, I felt aggrieved, and if I expressed more warmth than the Senator from New Hampshire thinks proper, it was because such charges are offensive to me. I can not sit quietly under an imputation of this kind and I never will do so here or elsewhere. I am glad the Senator has explained his meaning more fully, and I am content that he has entertained the Senate in the amusing manner he has in withdrawing himself from the unfortunate position in which he was placed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Only one word more. All I did say was that the Senator admitted that he helped to deceive the Senate. Of course the Senator meant that he had been the medium of a communication which deceived the Senate. That I have already said. But the Senator from Florida, very peremptorily saying, "I want the Senator's attention right now," demanded that I should retract the very offensive words he said I had used. "Retract" is a threatening word, although the Senator said he did not intend to threaten. Yet, notwithstanding the manner of approach of the Senator, this is what I said, and I submit to the Senate that it was ample and complete:

I will say that I do not think he intended to deceive the Senate. I think he acted in the most perfect good faith. I think he sent his telegram to Messrs. Barbee & Smith and reported the denial by them in the most absolute and perfect good faith. If the Senator would rather I should say that he led the Senate into an error or caused the Senate to vote under a mistake, or anything else that is more euphonious, I will use that language; but all the same, Mr. President, the Senate was deceived.

Afterwards, being still further called to account by my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I said:

I have disclaimed all intention to make any unkind or unjust imputation on the Senator from Florida. My feelings of friendship for him are equal to those I entertain for the Senator from Georgia. They were all deceived; there is no doubt about that; and the Senate was deceived; and nobody did it except Barbee & Smith. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. BACON. That is all right.

Mr. BATE. I suppose the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire apply to all who participated in the matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. Unquestionably. I should be very unwilling to put myself in the attitude of believing, and I do not believe, that one single Senator on this floor knew that these fees had been agreed to be paid and did not state it to the Senate or stated to the contrary.

I think all this ought to have satisfied the Senator from Florida. I think it would have satisfied any native Southerner on the other side of the House when I had made my withdrawal as explicit as I did. The Senator persisted, and demanded that I should retract the very words he named for me to retract. Human nature is very much the same North and South, and I did not make any further retraction. But I have no desire to prolong the controversy with the Senator from Florida. I realize now, on looking the matter over, that the Senators were more sensitive than I thought they ought to be, and I have made my statement of my belief in their perfect sincerity and integrity and good faith as broad as I can, and I will repeat it again if the Senator from Alabama wants me to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I did not know that I had anything to do with the quarrel between the Senator from Florida and the Senator from New Hampshire, nor do I understand why the Senator from New Hampshire should attempt to lug me into it. The only word that he has quoted upon me is that I said the church had no attorney. My reason for saying that was that I made a report twenty years ago, about, and I have never heard of the case from that time to this through any agent or attorney. No person has approached me about it in any way at all, and when it was stated on the floor of the Senate that Barbee & Smith had informed the Senate that there was no contract for the payment of fees, I felt assured that that must be true, knowing the character of these men simply. I did not know them intimately at all, but I understood that they were men of some considerable importance and great respectability.

Mr. President, I desire to have the resolution read. I want to hear what is in it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire and report to whom the money was paid under the claim of the Methodist Book Concern South, and also as to all circumstances connected with the passage of the bill providing for the payment of said claim and with the subsequent payment of the money under said act of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not know what the purpose of the resolution is except to bring up all of the elements of scandal that may exist in respect to this case. That probably is a congenial and pleasant movement on the part of some Senators, but I think when we undertake to pass resolutions they ought to have some definite and specific purpose, and I should like to know whether it is the expectation of anybody in connection with the passage of this resolution that any steps are to be taken by the Senate or by the Congress for the purpose of revoking the proceedings heretofore had on this claim, such, for instance, as requiring the Attorney-General of the United States to sue for and recover the amount of this vote or bill upon the ground that the Congress of the United States were deceived in rendering that judgment or in passing that vote, and their being deceived we have the right to treat the act as being null and recover the money. I do not know whether the Senate is invited to go to that extent or not. There is no definite purpose in the resolution except merely to open up an inquiry that will lead to exposure of some fraud or improprieties that are alleged to have been perpetrated in connection with this claim.

This is rather an important step to be taken by the Senate, and it ought to have some end in view, some purpose in view. There are a number of claims which have been passed through the Senate of the United States and the other House which have been assisted through these bodies by what we call lobbyists; that is, attorneys and agents who have swarmed the corridors of this Capitol from year to year for twenty years and who have been promoting the passage of bills. It is a discreditable kind of proceeding, because oftentimes such events as these occur. Sometimes they are concealed, sometimes they come to the front and are exposed.

Is a precedent to be established here now by this case that would lead to this result, that the Senate would proceed, after it had ascertained the facts, as everybody here has conceded they exist, to direct that the money should be recovered; proceed to repeal the act, if you please, or declare it null on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and undue influence? I do not know that undue influence is alleged to have been exercised by Barbee & Smith or by Stahlman upon any Senator or any member of the House of Representatives or that his vote has been corrupted in any way. I do not understand that that proposition is involved here, and I can not understand, if that is not the fact, how one of these claim agents or one of these promoters of a claim can have very much evil influence in presenting the case, one side of it or the other side of it, to the minds of men who are intelligent enough to sit in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. You might as well say that a judge on the bench is corrupted if a corrupt man appears before him to argue a case which has not the foundation of truth and honesty.

The Senate in passing upon these claims acts, of course, in the double capacity of judging of their validity and then appropriating money to pay them. If we are going to the extent of saying that any claim which has been lobbied, as the word goes, through the House of Representatives and the Senate must be reinvestigated and a reconsideration of it must be had; that the parties involved in it must refund the money and must be punished for contempt of the Houses of Congress, we have a pretty large contract ahead of us. No later than this morning, as I came to the Capitol, a man I have known here for twenty years, not intimately, but he appears to be a respectable man—he has been so presented to me—took it upon himself to inform me that a claim for $388,000 in favor of John Roach, for which I voted along with the balance of the members of the Senate (I think a majority, if not all of us), had been lobbied through the Congress of the United States by one Nat McKay, a lobby lawyer of Washington, as he told me (I do not know Mr. McKay), and that Mr. McKay got 50 per cent of it. That is a recent transaction, and that came through the Committee on Naval Affairs. That was a contested claim. That was a claim which was pretty fiercely fought here, in the committee, and elsewhere, I think. That may be all fustian; there may be no truth in it. I do not assert that there is a symptom of truth in it, except merely the respectability of the man who told me it was so.

I bring that to the attention of the Senate of the United States. I become a volunteer medium to inform the Senate of the United States that there are a number of cases, perhaps this one particularly, lying around us here that demand investigation. Let us strike to the line. Let us understand what we are doing, whether we are merely amusing ourselves here by bringing up accusations against communities and churches and people whose hearts are tender upon questions of this sort, or whether we have an honest purpose in our hearts of trying to recover back for the United States money that has been improperly appropriated through the fraudulent pretenses and representations of other men; and if we commence it, let us go to the bottom of it. Let us investigate this question which I put before the Senate in regard to the action upon the John Roach case, and see whether or not there was actually paid to this lobbyist 50 per cent on a claim of $388,000 on account of a demand that I always considered to be entirely just in favor of Mr. Roach and his heirs for some wrong treatment that he had received in the statement of his account for the building of ships for the United States which are now floating upon the waters and are now engaged in fighting for the United States—good vessels.

I do not think that this is a legitimate resolution. Yet I am going to vote for it. I am compelled to vote for it for the reason that it strikes at a great denomination in my own country of which my father and my mother were members and all my sisters were members, and I shall not stand on the floor of the Senate and hear those people impeached in any respect or have it said that they are delinquent in their moral duty because the Senator from New Hampshire thinks that they ought to proceed or somebody ought to proceed to recover this money from Barbee & Smith or Stahlman. They have been worse treated by far than the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States by this transaction. Senators may amuse themselves here and triplightly upon their tongues accusations against great bodies of people in other sections of the country without feeling that there is the slightest responsibility about it, but the responsibility will come home to them. Whenever I am on this floor and they bring up accusations of that kind, they must back them up and carry them to results.

I am not going to offer any amendment to the resolution; I am not in an attitude to do it; but I now pronounce the resolution not a sincere effort to get at justice and to have the money repaid to the United States out of which this Government has been defrauded, for it has not been defrauded out of a cent, but it is an effort merely to scandalize a great religious denomination in another section of the country, and I think, sir, for mere political purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not intend to say another word in this debate, but what the Senator from Alabama has just said in regard to the resolution obliges me to say something. I am perfectly willing to put the resolution in any form, and I can say to the Senator from Alabama that the resolution, so far as I am concerned, is entirely sincere. I have cast no reflections on any section, on any church, on any body of people. My sole object was, on the information which had come to me, to expose what I considered scandalous methods employed by a lobbyist and by two representatives of the Methodist Book Concern in getting a great claim through the Senate. That, I thought, ought to be exposed. I never supposed the Government could recover the money. I have no doubt that the statement of the Senator from Alabama that the money was legally due is correct, but I thought that this exposure would help to correct a great abuse.

I offered the amendment cutting off these attorneys and agents at the time the bill was here, and Senators got up and told me that it was an affront to honorable men even to offer such an amendment. It now proves that I was correct and that it ought to have been put on the bill, and that if it had been the money would have gone to the great charity to which it was intended by the Senate that it should go, and not into the pocket of a professional lobbyist or agent. I never thought we could recover the money for the Government. No such idea ever crossed my mind, and I want to say that in my judgment members of that great sect, that great denomination of Christians feel to-day the misfortune of this matter and the scandal involved in it infinitely more keenly than does the Senate of the United States or the House of Representatives.

I certainly have no desire to cast the slightest reflection on a sect or on a section of the country. They have suffered more by this than anyone else, and I think we may leave it to them to rectify the wrong which has been done. After the Committee on Claims have reported as to the facts of the case, I should like to see them bring in a bill for a general law about the fees that these agents are to have, and make it impossible for agents for claims to get beyond a certain very small percentage of the claims. In that case we should not have a repetition of such a scandal as this, and we would reduce very perceptibly the number of claims which are knocking at the doors of the Treasury.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I approve of the last suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts as to lobbyists.

Mr. MORGAN. So do I.

Mr. BATE. I wish to see such action condemned, and I want to see them forbidden to come around the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. So do I.

Mr. BATE. I think that is the sentiment of the Senate and that the splendid representative spirits who compose this body feel that way; but still, situated as we are, we are liable to be imposed upon in many cases. Away with all such men who lobby around these corridors! And I believe such is the sentiment not only of the country, but of this Senate as a body. I approve and indorse the language in this regard of the Senator from Massachusetts, "Away with lobbyists!"

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I think the resolution ought to be amended so as to authorize the committee to send for persons and papers. I omitted to move that amendment. It may be done by general consent, I suppose.

Mr. HOAR. I think it can not be done by general consent. My recollection is that the statute prohibits the payment of money from the contingent fund, and an account is not allowed at the Treasury unless it has first gone to the Committee on Contingent Expenses of this body. So it is not a rule that unanimous consent can waive; it is the law. I suggest to the Senator to let the resolution stand, as the Senate has adopted it unanimously, and then to bring in a supplementary resolution and have it sent to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. TELLER. That course is entirely satisfactory, Mr. President.

EDWARD P. JENNINGS.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2080) to correct the military record of Edward P. Jennings.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DES MOINES RAPIDS POWER COMPANY.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4036) to amend an act entitled "An act granting to the Des Moines Rapids Power Company the right to erect, construct, operate, and maintain a wing dam, canal, and power station in the Mississippi River, in Hancock County, Ill."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 2 of the act entitled "An act granting to the Des Moines Rapids Power Company the right to erect, construct, operate, and maintain a wing dam, canal, and power station in the Mississippi River, in Hancock County, Ill., approved February 24, 1894," be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the works herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within four years from February 24, 1894."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

N. WARD CADY.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6098) to correct the military record of N. Ward Cady, late major, Second Mounted Rifles, New York Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, after the word "directed," in line 4, to strike out down to and including the word "regiment," in line 7, in the following words:

Set aside the findings of the court-martial in the case of N. Ward Cady, late major, Second Mounted Rifles, New York Volunteers, and to grant to said N. Ward Cady an honorable discharge from said company and regiment.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Revoke, annul, and set aside the General Orders, No. 42, dated Headquarters Army of the Potomac, October 26, 1864, approving the findings and sentence of the general court-martial before which N. Ward Cady, late major, Second Mounted Rifles, New York Volunteers, was tried, found guilty, and sentenced "to be dismissed the service with loss of all pay due or to become due," and to issue to said Cady an honorable discharge as of date October 26, 1864.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke, annul, and set aside the General Orders, No. 43, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 172) authorizing the President in his discretion to waive the one-year suspension from promotion and to order reexamination of officers of the Army in certain cases.

HOME FOR AGED AND INFIRM COLORED PEOPLE.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2821) to provide a home for aged and infirm colored people.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment, in section 3, line 11, after the word "claims," to insert "which shall be presented before January 1, 1899, all claims which shall be presented after that date being hereby barred;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That all other moneys, arrears of pay and bounty, and prize money and other allowances that are due the estates of deceased colored soldiers who served in the late war be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be invested as an endowment fund for the national memorial home for aged and infirm colored persons of the United States, with the exception of so much as may be held to pay off all or any claims that may be proven against the fund, which shall be determined by the law governing the settlement of those claims which shall be presented before January 1, 1899, all claims which shall be presented after that date being hereby barred: Provided, That all the States in these United States shall have the right to organize one or more similar associations, and that one or all of their members can be members of the association known as the Home for Aged and Infirm Colored Persons of the United States by complying with the requirements of the association; and that any such association now existing, or that may be formed hereafter, shall have the right to place in the institution or on the grounds of the institution any memorial of deceased colored soldiers or representative colored men, providing that all such memorials are in harmony with such institutions, by and with the consent of the trustees of the national memorial home for aged and infirm colored persons of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer an amendment. I move to add the following proviso:

And provided, That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General of the United States shall constitute a board which shall have and exercise supervision over the expending and investment of the said fund, and that all vouchers must be certified by the Attorney-General before any money is drawn from the Treasury, and the money only taken from the Treasury by such vouchers as the work progresses; that the said endowment fund be invested in safe security in land or the first mortgage on land or in lands, by the trustees of the National Memorial Home with the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States, and that the disbursing officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to pay the money upon the presentation of such vouchers as drawn by the association known as the Home for the Aged and Infirm Colored People of the United States.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLISTMENT OF COOKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Commissary-General of Subsistence, inclosing a draft of a bill directing the enlistment of cooks in the Regular and Volunteer armies of the United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and ordered to be printed.

PARIS INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith (having reference to Senate Document No. 4, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session) a report made by Thomas W. Cridler, Third Assistant Secretary of State, who, upon the death of Maj. Moses P. Handy, I designated to continue the work as special commissioner, under the act of Congress approved July 19, 1897, in relation to the acceptance by the Government of the United States of the invitation of France to participate in the international exposition to be held at Paris from April 15 to November 5, 1900.

I cordially renew my recommendation that a liberal appropriation be immediately granted.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, June 14, 1898.

INTERNATIONAL AMERICAN BANK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3414.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3414) to carry into effect the recommendations of the International American Conference by the incorporation of the International American Bank.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Alabama will pardon me, I regard this as one of the most important bills before the Senate. There is evidently not a quorum present. I make that suggestion.

Mr. PETTUS. I am sorry the Senator makes the suggestion.

Mr. BACON. I desire that the Senate shall be present to hear the argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, it seems to me that we are drifting a long way from our ancient moorings. Senators who favor the pending bill can not tell us whether it is to organize a governmental agency or not. If it is not to organize a governmental agency, Senators who are lawyers would be slow to say that they had any authority to enact it.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss to-day the legal question as to the authority of the United States to organize such an institution. The greatest danger, as it is believed by most thinking men in the United States, unbiased by party, is the concentration of power into the hands of a few men to the destruction of the will of the masses of the people. We have heard in the Senate almost daily complaints of the wonderful power and influence of concentrated incorporated money, and that danger is threatening us more and more every day. Senators, we ought not to destroy this Government by hastening on its destruction, and that is exactly what bills of this sort will do. Surely we who believe in a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States can never consent to an amount of power such as is conferred by this bill on any corporation on earth.

It was a doctrine that was mighty well fought for years and years that Congress had no power to charter a bank at all, and that if it had the power it ought never to do it. To be sure, that question was settled in an adverse way years ago by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the lawyers had to submit to it; but we have never submitted, and so far as I am concerned I never will submit to the policy of concentrating all the wealth of the country into a few hands, whereby we shall cease to be a republic and be as Rome was, and all those ancient governments, whether republican or otherwise, and go the road they went. Men have read history to no purpose if they believe that a free government can exist with all the money in the country in the hands of a few individuals.

Mr. President, we read in the Book that the love of money is the root of all evil; and it is the root of those wonderful machines that are now in operation and operating rapidly to the destruction of all republican forms of government.

What gentleman on this floor would like to be associated with what they call the sugar trust unless it was for the money that was in it? It has been denounced over and over again by almost all Senators here. It is an institution that has gathered into its power all that concerns its business, and makes the laws conform to its will. We talk about the oil trust as a great evil in the land, and no doubt it is a wonderful evil.

Mr. President, we made a grand mistake a long time ago. It never was dreamed of then that a private corporation could be incorporated by the United States. It never was thought of. We made a great mistake years and years ago, and will never recover from it, in allowing one of these corporations to cross State lines at all. It is not a citizen. In no sense is it a citizen. It may have its property rights, but by extending to it the privilege of crossing the State line and crossing the continent we have built up among us institutions too powerful to be controlled by the law of the land or the people of the land.

It is a great misfortune wherever wealth is concentrated in this form in the hands of a few men. The Good Book that I spoke of a while ago tells us, and tells us in the plainest possible language, the rich ruleth the poor and the borrower is servant to the lender. We all know that is so. Have we not seen thousands of instances where men, otherwise upright and honest, have had their will bent and bowed to the will of the lender?

As I said at the outset, I am not going to discuss the legal questions involved in this bill. I am only going to assert the proposition, and debate it, that this Congress, even if it has the power to do so, ought never to pass such a bill as this. It reminds me of the character given by one of our wise men.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and I had an old neighbor, a wise man, a man to whom nature had given a large amount of brain, and he had cultivated his brain from his infancy and had made it useful to himself and mankind. I speak of our friend Mr. Joel Mathews, a man of high reputation at home. He had an acquaintance there who before and during the war bought large plantations and all the inhabitants thereon and gave his notes for them. Those notes went abroad and fell into the hands of capitalists in New York, and they came to this wise old man to ask him about the financial standing of the maker of those notes. "Oh, yes," he said, "he is a man of wonderful financial ability—wonderful. Why, sir, he would buy Paris for a private residence and rent New York and London as places of business—on credit." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, that is only a feeble illustration of the bill that you have before you. There never was a corporation on earth that had the power that is conferred in this bill on this International American Bank. There never was such power on earth in all its phases. We fought the old Bank of the United States; and, Mr. President, though a very young man, I am old enough to remember that fight when it was going on. It was a fight between the people for political liberty on the one side and a corporation on the other side for domination over the people of the United States; and the people in that contest prevailed.

This corporation is not given the power to issue notes to circulate as money, but outside of that power it has more power than the Bank of the United States was ever charged with having. If you go on creating corporations of this sort, the Senate of the United States had as well abdicate its power and surrender it to an agent, or make a commission to run the Government of the United States. They are making commissions for many such purposes, and they had just as well have one commission to organize and control the Government of the United States in all its parts, without reference to any prejudices in regard to our constitutional rights.

The man has got a hard face now who claims a constitutional right at all, especially if he claims it for a State. They have been trampled on so long that we have all become accustomed to it; and it is considered as rather derogatory to a man, at all events he is not considered up to date, if he invokes any of those old foggy notions about the Constitution of the United States reserving any rights to the States.

But let us look into the heart of this bill. What is it? It is a bill to incorporate a bank with a capital stock on a sliding scale of from $5,000,000 to $25,000,000. The capital is to be $5,000,000 at the start, and it may be $25,000,000.

What has this bank authority to do? In the first place, the committee, when they originally drafted this bill, made the existence of this corporation to be twenty years; but they very easily put on an amendment making it fifty years. When they started out to enumerate their powers, about the first thing they said was that they should have power "to make contracts." That is not a power conferred in connection with any other thing at all. It is an independent, substantive power, conferred in a separate paragraph; and that is the whole of the paragraph.

It shall have power to make contracts.

You will find as you go on that they meant what they said, that they have power to make contracts of almost every description.

The next thing noticeable in this bill is that the bank may employ agents and transact their business in the United States—a pretty broad surface—employ agents and transact their business in the United States "or elsewhere." There is not a spot on the globe where this bank can not establish their agent and carry on their business outside of the United States—not one. They can carry on business in every piece of territory on earth if they can get permission from some one else. "In the United States or elsewhere." The words are unlimited, for the man who wrote this bill wrote it with the idea that he would make one thing that would override all these little things called the sugar trust and the like, and overshadow all the business of the world.

This bank is specially given authority "to act as the financial agent of any nation, state, government, municipality, corporation, or person." It can act as the agent of any governmental or natural person. I have never seen such an authority as that given in any bank charter on earth before. It may be that some of them have it.

Here is another wonderful power:

And to perform any and all acts and duties not inconsistent with law that it may undertake to assume as such financial agent.

They can transact any business on the face of the earth that is not prohibited by law, if they will only assume and undertake to do it. There is no business of any kind or description that they can not do for another as agent in any part of the world, provided they will undertake to contract to do it.

Not content with doing a banking business, they have another and a very broad and large field of operation given them specifically outside of the banking business entirely. This monster corporation is not only empowered to do all the banking business in the world, but it may go into another branch of business "and act as trustee in any mortgage given to secure such bonds" as they may undertake to negotiate for other people; to act as trustee and certify to the bonds. They have authority to monopolize that branch of business as well as the banking business itself. That is no part of a banker's business, but this corporation is going to combine in itself all banking, and then branch out into collateral matters of business—none of your picayune affairs, either; they are going to be trustees for the transcontinental railroads; they are going to certify bonds for them "or like corporations or individuals or States." I do not see if you want to make a bank why you should make this universal trustee.

When they come down to the banking powers they enumerate them all "to do all kinds of banking business except issuing notes to circulate as money"—all kinds and of every sort and description. Just look at the specific powers given to them. They are authorized to receive deposits, and that power is without any limit whatever. They are authorized to issue letters of credit payable to the order of the persons named therein. That is without any limit whatsoever, for it is understood, you know, that this bank, which is to be chartered in the District of Columbia for some purpose or other, I do not know what, unless they thought they could incorporate in the District of Columbia and that they could not incorporate elsewhere; but, at any rate, they are to be located here or in New York—they are to issue letters of credit.

The idea is—for these gentlemen have magnificent notions about this banking business—that they are going to give you a letter of credit, you can put it in your pocket, you can go all over the world, and when you get down to the Cape of Good Hope, you just step into a bank there and say, "Here, I have a letter of credit on you from this bank that owns all the money of the United States," and they will hand the money out; or you go into the interior of Africa and pull out your letter of credit, and you have your money right at your hand.

Mr. President, the man would be a fool who did not know that substantially that very thing in reference to the cities of the world could be done to-day almost in every national emporium on earth. It is not to be supposed that a magnificent institution like this is going into the country. It will go to the cities; no doubt, to many of the cities, and it will go to New York; and right in New York you can get a letter of credit or a bill of exchange on any one of the important places of the earth. They will never go to any small place; they will never draw letters of credit on Santiago. Oh, no; they will draw them on Panama; they might draw them on Havana; but they are not going to enter any of the small towns.

The bank will be absolutely useless in that respect, and Senators know it. So far as the ability of the traveling world to get accommodations of this sort is concerned, almost every man knows that it can be done, and without any serious trouble, now in any civilized nation on earth. It is a mere bald pretense; that is all there is of it. It is an excuse to accumulate this monstrous, this vicious, power in the hands of one corporation.

Mr. President, they can issue as many letters of credit as they see proper; they can loan money on personal security, and that has a limit; but the limit which is put on this power, when it is construed in connection with all the powers in this bill, is farcical. "To loan money on personal security." But they must keep on hand one-fourth of the capital stock. One-fourth of the capital stock would be a mere drop in the bucket to the money that this corporation would handle. If the capital of the corporation be $5,000,000, there would be a million and a quarter of the capital to be kept on hand. If they keep a million and a quarter of the $5,000,000 on hand, they can borrow one-half as much as the capital stock; they can borrow two and one-half millions if their capital is only five millions, and they can borrow twelve millions and a half if they stock this corporation up to its limit. The only restraint on their borrowing is the amount of their capital stock. They must not borrow beyond one-half of that.

What does "borrow" mean? These words are merely words of deception in connection with this bill. Do you not all know that the capital stock of banks is not a drop in the bucket compared with the money that they handle? A bank with a capital of $5,000,000 frequently has largely more than the capital stock on deposit. There is no hindrance to loaning out all of the depositors' money. They can loan it all out just as much as they please.

Then, Mr. President, after giving all these powers—and they are very extravagant—there is not one single word in this bill to limit this corporation as to the amount they shall charge for interest. They may charge usurious rates. I say "usury;" yes, it will be usury whenever they begin to loan money. They will have men in their power, and they will require them to pay just such amount of interest as they see fit. There is no limit; there is no rate of interest, none whatever, in this bill.

Mr. President, we all know that when the Government of the United States establishes a bank, the laws of the United States must govern its transactions; and although the Senator in charge of this bill has had his attention directly called to it, he said that interest might vary at different places; that he did not know what rate of interest to fix; and the distinguished committee and the Senators who advocated the bill seemed to be entirely satisfied.

I may be mistaken, of course, but I do not know of a bank that was ever chartered by the United States Government which was not limited—certainly the national banks are limited. They can not charge more than 6 per cent interest. Why should that be so? It looks curious. The interest varies in different places. The national banks are limited to 6 per cent by their charters made by this Congress. Why should this bank have that sort of an exemption over all other banks that have been chartered by the United States? The old Bank of the United States had a limit on its power of charging interest, a fixed amount beyond which it should not go. But they went beyond it. I do not mean to say that any law of Congress could ever confine that bank in any way whatever, for it could not do it, nor can it confine this bank inside of any law, constitutional or otherwise, if it is ever organized.

Surely Senators, after considering the subject, would not dare to charter a bank and not limit its power to charge interest. No State government, so far as I know, has ever done it; and I hope that it never will be done by any government, unless it shall be a government formed to rule among the Napoleons of the exchange, those men who think that it is right and proper to gamble on the welfare of the whole people, and to make bread almost impossible of attainment by poor men, although the country is overflowing with the fullness of the crops. We have had a late instance—thank God in His mercy the man has gone where he ought to go, so we are told—we have had an instance lately where bread was doubled in price in a very short time just by the manipulations of one man.

It is the most fearful power on earth. There is no despot on earth that is half as cruel as the despot of money. Gambling! Oh, I reckon they were not gambling, although they carried on this business principally in Chicago. There is an opinion stated by one of the old Romans, and it does a man's heart good to read some common sense once in a while in a law book. They sold for actual delivery in Chicago in a short time more wheat than was produced in the United States in some three or four years. It was more wheat than the United States could produce in three or four years, and it was to be delivered in a few months. One of the judges said: "We are told that all this is for actual delivery, and every man, woman, and child in Chicago knows that it is gambling; and this court is unwilling to confess itself more ignorant than all the people."

These gambling transactions are mainly fostered by just such things as you are trying to create here to-day. They are speculations beyond the conception of mortal man. They are gambling transactions such as were never heard of before on earth.

Mr. President, I have told you something about these powers; but I have not got down to the main part of these powers yet. They are not trifling.

I ought to have said before I got to the main question that they have a right to establish branch banks all over the United States, and they thought they would be very moderate about it, extremely moderate. They are absolutely prohibited from establishing more than eight branch banks at a time, but they can establish as many eights in a year as they choose, provided they do not establish more than eight at a time. Then they are compelled to establish four to the South of us—one in Mexico, one in the West India Islands, and two in South America—and they can establish as many more there as they choose; and they may have them whenever they choose in the United States or elsewhere, provided they do not reduce these four to a less number.

After doing all that, after making such a monster as never was seen before or dreamt of in the legislative history of this country, they come down to another sort of an incidental power given in a kind of a backhand way. The introduction of it is a very peculiar thing. I want to read the language. It was a master hand that put this in as a kind of parenthesis, telling of the powers they have:

All such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking under the provisions and terms and for the purposes of this act—

That is a very innocent sort of a provision—including the power to purchase and hold shares of the capital stock of any foreign corporation authorized to transact banking business in foreign countries.

There is absolutely the power to own all the capital stock of every bank on earth that is not in the United States, to buy it all and own it all and carry on that business all over the world.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Can the Senator from Alabama give any reason why "domestic" was not put in as well as foreign, so that they could absorb all the banks?

Mr. PETTUS. I reckon they thought that somebody would kick. I know I am kicking against the pricks now myself. I understand that perfectly well, and I almost shed tears over the fact that I will not have the support even of my own party in what I am saying. Here men who were afraid of one national bank in the United States, confined to the United States, create a bank and put in a kind of parenthesis at the bottom of the sentence the power to own all the banks on earth outside of the United States. I can not conceive any fit answer to the Senator from Arkansas. Why they left out the domestic banks I do not know. It ought to have it, because if this is going to be the bank of the earth, it ought to have the power to own all the stock and all the banks in the United States, State as well as national. That is where we are coming to anyhow, and I am sorry to see Democrats willing to hasten us on to that point.

Mr. President, do not Senators stop to think when they conceive of giving an institution like this such power as that? You talk about objecting to different corporations combining and influencing the markets of the country, controlling the business of the country; and whenever eight or ten of them get together, you call them trusts and you condemn them by the law, and I am proud to say the Senator from Alabama framed a law on this subject that would do honor to any statesman on earth, and it is the law now against these trusts, and here is the most damnable trust that God ever allowed to live on earth. It is a power beyond human conception. Mr. President, we can go along and vote such things; we can vote the damnation of the people, and that is what we are doing whenever we create such corporations as this. For God's sake let us halt before we take such a plunge as this.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, before answering directly what the Senator from Alabama has just said, I wish briefly to make answer to a proposition advanced by him when the bill was under consideration yesterday.

He complained at that time of the provisions of this bill because the bill in its state at the time when he made the objection did not provide for the taxation of the shares to be issued by this bank; and in that connection he contended that without special authority being given in the act, the shares of this bank in the hands of the owners and holders of them could not be taxed by the local authorities. I stated at the time that I did not agree with him as to that proposition. I did not, however, have the authorities before me; but in the absence of all authority, with an assurance equal to that which he has just now manifested and with a confidence in his knowledge and ability which lacked nothing whatever, he told us that it had been decided over and over again that the shares of stock in a bank of this character could not be taxed by State authorities unless there was in the act creating the bank a provision granting permission to the State so to tax the shares.

Mr. PETTUS. Not in the act creating it.

Mr. FORAKER. Or otherwise; by some kind of Congressional enactment.

Mr. PETTUS. That is it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, instead of the law having been settled as claimed by the Senator from Alabama, it has always, from the beginning of our Government, been held by our Supreme Court, in every instance in which it has rendered judgment upon such a question, that the property of a governmental agency, when the agency is ceded or established, is taxable by the States as other property and that only the franchise to exist or the operation itself of the governmental agency could not be taxed by the State.

It was not necessary, in my judgment, that the Congress should have expressly provided that the shares of national banks in the hands of holders might be taxable in the States. I think they were taxable without that, and that the provision was put into that statute only in order that there might be no room for doubt or question about their being taxable. In the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, reported in 4 Wheaton, page 316, the Supreme Court say:

The States have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into effect the powers vested in the National Government.

This principle does not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the Bank of the United States, in common with the other real property in a particular State, nor to a tax imposed on the proprietary interest which the citizens of that State may hold in this institution, in common with other property of the same description throughout the State.

In the opinion of the court the proposition stated in the syllabus as I have just read it is elaborated. The Supreme Court there say it is not prohibited to the States to tax the property of such agencies or corporations in the States, and that there is no limitation upon the power of the State in that regard except only when the State undertakes to interfere with the operation of the agency and render a nullity that which the National Government has established for the purpose of accomplishing some particular object.

In Mr. Cooley's work on Taxation, page 85, occurs the following, in discussing this question:

And a State may tax the property of Federal agencies with other property in the State, and as other property is taxed, when no law of Congress forbids, and when the effect of the taxation will not be to defeat or hinder the operations of the National Government.

In 18 Wallace, page 5, is reported the case of the Railroad Company vs. Peniston. I read briefly from this case. It is a recent decision of our Supreme Court, or comparatively so, rendered in 1873, and never questioned by that or any other court either before its rendition or since. The first paragraph of the syllabus reads as follows:

The exemption of agencies of the Federal Government from taxation by the States is dependent, not upon the nature of the agents, nor upon the mode of their constitution, nor upon the fact that they are agents, but upon the effect of the tax; that is, upon the question whether the tax does in truth deprive them of power to serve the Government as they were intended to serve it, or hinder the efficient exercise of their power. A tax upon their property merely, having no such necessary effect, and leaving them free to discharge the duties they have undertaken to perform, may be rightfully laid by the States. A tax upon their operations, being a direct obstruction to the exercise of Federal powers, may not be.

I wish now briefly to read from the decision itself, which was rendered by Mr. Justice Strong. I read first from page 90:

There are, we admit, certain subjects of taxation which are withdrawn from the power of the States, not by any direct or express provision of the Federal Constitution, but by what may be regarded as its necessary implications. They grow out of our complex system of government, and out of the fact that the authority of the National Government is legitimately exercised within the States. While it is true that Government can not exercise its power of taxation so as to destroy the State governments, or embarrass their lawful action, it is equally true that the States may not levy taxes the direct effect of which shall be to hinder the exercise of any powers which belong to the National Government. The Constitution contemplates that none of those powers may be restrained by State legislation. But it is often a difficult question whether a tax imposed by a State does in fact invade the domain of the General Government, or interfere with its operations to such an extent, or in such a manner, as to render it unwarranted. It can not be that a State tax which remotely affects the efficient exercise of a Federal power is for that reason alone inhibited by the Constitution.

There is a great deal more in this opinion to the same effect. I commend it to the consideration of the Senator from Alabama. After referring to the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, the opinion proceeds:

But when the question is, as in the present case—

The case then before the court—

whether the taxation of property is taxation of means, instruments, or agencies by which the United States carries out its powers, it is impossible to see how it can be pertinent to inquire whence the property originated or from whom its present owners obtained it.

But an examination of what was decided in those cases will reveal that they are in full harmony with the doctrine that the property of an agent of the General Government may be subjected to State taxation.

That is as far as I care to read.

Mr. PETTUS. I will ask the Senator if he did not break the paragraph in two?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; I did not break any paragraph in two. I was about to read another paragraph, but seeing that I could not read it and make it intelligible without reading another preceding it, which had reference to another case, I concluded that I would not take the time to go back and read both of them.

But I wish to state that according to the authorities which I have read, and according to all authorities, for there is not a decision that the Senator from Alabama can cite to the contrary, it is competent for the States to tax the property of an agency of the General Government when they tax it only as other property is taxed, and the only thing that the States are prohibited from taxing when they come to taxing governmental agencies is the franchise, the existence, or the operation of the agency. The National Government will not allow a State to interfere with or impede or retard or pursue or hinder or bring to naught the operations of an agency which it has set up for the purpose of consummating some particular object. But there is nowhere any decision that holds that because a corporation created by the National Government may have some kind of function or agency with respect to the Government, its property shall be exempt, or the stock that may be issued by the corporation shall be exempt, from taxation in the hands of the citizens who are the owners and holders of the same in the several States.

Therefore the committee were not in error when they took the view of that matter which they did take, and their purpose in setting forth that the stock should be taxed in the hands of the owners and holders was simply, as was the case with respect to the national banks, to remove beyond all question the proposition that such stock was taxable in the hands of the owners and holders. And hence when the whole section went out upon motion of the Senator from Colorado, no right of taxation was taken away from the States, and especially there is not any "brigand behind the bush," as the Senator from Alabama seems to think there is with respect to everything here to which he takes exception.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] asked some questions yesterday which I was not prepared upon authority to answer at the time, although I answered him upon reason and principle as well as I could, and I find upon consulting the authorities that he was at the time answered correctly. The Senator asked, in the course of the colloquy which was proceeding here in the Chamber, whether or not this incorporated company which we are proposing to create was to be an agency of the Government. When he was answered in the way in which he was answered, namely, that while it was not created to carry out any specific purpose that was expressed in the act, yet it was an agency of the Government in the sense that it was intended to promote the commerce of this country with other countries and was therefore warranted by the constitutional provision which gives to Congress the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations, he asked us to lay our hands on, or point our finger to, the provisions in the statute that expressed any such agency or any such national purpose, intimating that the general provision to which I called his attention, or the general purpose which I had pointed out, was not sufficient to meet the requirement, but that it would be necessary, in order that this should be brought within the purview of the constitutional provision, to put into the bill a designation or a definite express description of what we were to do in that behalf.

I have before me the 135 United States, and I read from page 657 the case of the Cherokee Nation vs. Kansas Railway Company. The court says:

Congress has power to regulate commerce, not only with foreign nations and among the several States, but with the Indian tribes. It is not necessary that an act of Congress should express, in words, the purpose for which it was passed. The court will determine for itself whether the means employed by Congress have any relation to the powers granted by the Constitution.

They go on to say that the railroad which was there empowered by Congress to do certain things, although incorporated by a State, and not incorporated by the National Government, was yet an agency which might be employed as such by the National Government in connection with the regulation of commerce, and that it was a sufficient regulation of commerce to promote commerce between that Territory and the States adjoining it through which the railroad passed. Just so it is here, saying to-day upon express authority, as we said yesterday upon general principle, that it is insufficient to bring the proposed international bank within the purview of this constitutional provision, for us to point out that in the general way in which we have claimed for it it is an agency of the Government, employed by it in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States, for it is to do business among the States and with foreign nations, and it is sufficient to demonstrate that it is employed in the regulation of commerce to show that it deals with instruments of commerce, bills of exchange, etc., in a way that is calculated to promote commerce and to extend our trade relations, and in that way to benefit the people of the United States.

I might cite a great many other authorities to the same effect, but I will not take the time to do it. However, there is one other to which I wish to call attention, and that is a decision in 91 United States, page 280, where the court defines what commerce is. It is the case of Welton vs. The State of Missouri. The court says:

Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of different States. The power to regulate it embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted.

So they go on to the same effect. I have read enough for the purpose I have in view. I want to show that the term "commerce" as employed in the Constitution is not confined, when properly interpreted, to mere bargaining, to mere buying and selling, to exporting and importing, but that it relates to all the business transactions which the people of this country may have with another country. It is a broad term, practically without any limitation at all, except only as there is, in the nature of things, a limitation upon the general powers of man to have transactions.

Not only is the term "commerce" broad enough to cover all transactions, but it has been time and again expressly held, as held there, that it covers not only the general transactions, but each and every instrumentality that may be employed in the consummation of transactions, and therefore it is competent for us in legislating with respect to the regulation of commerce to legislate in such a way as to affect the giving of promissory notes and bills of exchange and drafts and all the other kinds of paper instruments that are employed by mankind in the transaction of their business one with another.

This bank is designed to do that very thing. The bank is therefore a corporation created by the National Government, created by the Congress of the United States in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and it is regulating commerce when it provides a means for the giving of exchange and all the other commercial and negotiable instruments that are mentioned and described in these sections which have been so fully commented upon by the Senator from Alabama.

I need not pursue that further, and I am loath to feel that there is any necessity for me to say anything more than I have already said. But the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] would seem to call for some kind of an answer as to the merits of the measure, conceding that, in a general way, it is appropriate legislation.

This bill has been very severely arraigned by the Senator from Alabama. Let me say that I do not share at all with the Senator from Alabama in the apprehension he has because of aggregations of capital such as are provided for by this measure. Aggregations of capital are sometimes abused. They are often made the agencies and instrumentalities of wrong, and there are noted instances of that kind, some of which the Senator from Alabama has referred to. But, Mr. President, on the other hand, aggregations of capital are essential in the transaction of the world's business, and surely essential in the transaction of a financial business of the character necessary to be transacted in our international affairs and concerns.

Why is it that the United States is at such a great disadvantage in our international commerce with the South American States and Republics? It is chiefly, or at least largely, due to the fact that in England and in other countries they have larger aggregations of capital by far employed in the business of international banking than the aggregation of capital here suggested. I believe in England alone the capital embarked in international banking enterprises amounts to $200,000,000. We have no capital at all so employed, and because we have no capital so employed when our merchants in the United States want to transact business with the other countries they must transact it, so far as the financial features of the transaction are concerned, through great business houses abroad. One of the purposes of this measure is to relieve us from that disadvantage.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, I rose to ask him, as he regards these aggregations of capital as advantageous, if he does not think, should there be an incorporation of this kind, that opportunity ought to be given for any other parties who desire to associate themselves together in a similar way to avail themselves of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, I do; and in committee I advocated the idea of making this a general law, under which all could become incorporated and engage in this business who might so desire. I have no objection to that. I would be glad to see the bill so amended, but it was the opinion of the committee, and I say it for the benefit of the Senator from Georgia, as the bill was necessarily somewhat experimental, that it was sufficient for the present to grant this particular charter, the only one that has been asked for. They did not know of anybody else who wanted to embark in this business. If it proved a successful venture, others could apply, and no doubt would apply, and if Congress found it to promote the best interests of the country to grant further charters, Congress will have the power to do so. There is nothing exclusive here; there is no monopoly here. Why do Senators talk about a monopoly? Why do Senators talk about a trust? Is not the opportunity free to all the people of the United States to come to Congress and get the same franchise these people are applying for?

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator suppose, however, that if these great powers are given to this corporation, hereafter not the Senator, but this corporation, would be inimical to the granting of a similar charter to others?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know whether it would be or not. I do not know why it should be. But whether it would be or not, Congress stands here the arbiter between all who might be interested.

Mr. BACON. I will state the object I had in view in asking the question. I do not think it good policy to grant these powers, but if they are to be granted at all, I think they ought to be free to all parties who desire to avail themselves of them, and I simply desired to know whether the Senator would be willing to accept an amendment of that kind to the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Georgia had been upon the Committee on Foreign Relations there would have been one more vote in favor of that proposition. The proposition, although I favored it, was not adopted there. Whenever others come forward who are worthy of such recognition, who can show that they have the necessary responsibility, character, and ability, I am willing to say that there should be a charter granted to them.

Mr. HAWLEY. I favor this bill, I am aiming to favor it, but I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is there any real difference in principle between this international bank and the International Navigation Company, which deals in steamboats and passengers and all that sort of thing? Why should there not be an international bank to take care of the financial relations of this great people?

Mr. FORAKER. I have never examined the charter of the International Navigation Company, and can not for that reason answer the Senator from Connecticut as he should be answered, but I take it, from all I know about it in a general way, that if it be proper and if it be good policy to grant such a charter as the International Navigation Company has received, upon the same general principles and for the same general reasons there ought to be a grant of this charter to this bank, in order that the financial transactions between this country and other countries that it is proposed to deal with and in may be taken care of and properly attended to.

I was saying when interrupted by the Senator from Georgia that I do not share the apprehension which has been expressed by the Senator from Alabama as to what will result if we grant a charter authorizing a bank with $5,000,000 capital. I had just pointed out that the international banks of London have a capital, as I have been informed, of $200,000,000, and no disadvantage has resulted in that country to the people of that country on that account, but a great deal of disadvantage has resulted to the people of this country.

You can not enter into competition successfully with a competitor of the character we have to meet in England, armed with such facilities as they have armed their banks with, unless you give a franchise such as is asked for here. A corporation created for this purpose can not subserve its purpose unless it can be sufficiently strong financially to go into the markets of those countries and there compete with the rivals they have in this business. And it is simply a question whether the United States, with respect to this matter and other matters, proposes now to move forward and keep abreast with the march of events or stand still and mark time, and thus stay in the rear and abide by the notions that prevailed in the years that have gone by.

We have come to a time, Mr. President, when there is ahead of the people of the United States great opportunities. We are, by the force of events that we can not control or prevent if we would, driven to consider our relations to the rest of the world. One of the great necessities of the present time is for the United States to extend our trade relations with the rest of the world and find markets for our surplus products in other countries, and coincident with this necessity is the situation that the war in which we are engaged has precipitated. Of necessity we are driven to think of our relations in other countries and of trades with other countries, and when we stop to consider what are the necessities of successful commercial enterprise there, we find, among other necessities, that for proper banking facilities. We do not have them, and thus are at a disadvantage.

This bill is intended to promote in part our interests in that respect. But you can not promote our interests and fully meet the requirements of the case unless the United States Government (at least that is the opinion of the committee) shall create a corporation of this character and shall invest it with all the powers necessary to a successful business, and authorize it, among other things, to have a capital sufficiently large to engage in the business that it is designed to engage in.

Now, the Senator from Alabama has talked about this as a monster. I do not wish to employ language of the character he has seen fit to employ; I do not wish to be personal; but I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that epithets and adjectives do not constitute merit in argument. If the bill be a monster, an examination of its provisions will show that it is such; and if it be not a monster, an examination of the provisions of the bill will show that the Senator has spoken either thoughtlessly or unjustly. In any event, he has spoken without any authority whatsoever. He has passed in review the powers that are conferred upon this corporation and has spoken of them as being so far in excess of the powers conferred upon national banks that it is enough to create astonishment simply to compare the one institution with the other. I have here the national banking law, and I want to read, in order that it may go into the RECORD along with the remarks of the Senator from Alabama in that particular, the powers that are conferred by Congress by that statute upon national banks.

First, the Senator comments most severely upon the fact that the bill does not contain any provisions prescribing the maximum rate of interest that may be charged, and he called me to account in terms that I thought were hardly justified for having answered his interrogatory in regard to that yesterday with a statement that I was not acquainted with the reason why the committee had not seen fit to put such a provision in the bill, except only as it occurred to me upon reason that they did not deem it necessary to undertake to prescribe a rate of interest for transactions that were to be carried on in all the various countries here enumerated, conditions varying as they do.

The Senator from Alabama says that this is the first law creating a bank which has not prescribed a rate of interest and fixed what the rate of interest shall be. Mr. President, the bill provides that the principal office of this bank shall be either in the city of Washington or in the city of New York, and that it shall have eight branch offices scattered throughout this country at points to be determined upon by the board of directors and approved by the Comptroller of the Currency. And it is to have eight branch offices in other countries—one in the West Indies, one in Mexico, and the others in Central and South American States at such points as may be determined upon by the board of directors and be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Nobody yet knows exactly where those branch offices will be located, but we all do know that they will be located in some one of the States or Territories referred to, and we all do know that wherever located they will be subject to the laws there in force. A bank doing business in the District of Columbia will be governed by the laws of the District of Columbia with respect to all matters concerning which the charter does not make mention. I think that is a proposition nobody will take issue with. If the statute be silent on the subject of interest and the principal office be established here or in the city of New York, the laws governing and fixing the rate of interest here or in New York, according as the principal office may be located at one place or the other, will fix the rate of interest which may be there charged. So, too, if you locate one in the State of the Senator from Georgia, will not the law of the State of Georgia—this law being silent on the subject—regulate the rate of interest there charged? I suppose that it will. If this bank shall go into the Republic of Mexico and seek to secure by convention a right to do business there, as is contemplated, it will be required, no doubt, to conform to the laws of the Republic of Mexico with respect to the interest that it may charge upon its loans.

But, Mr. President, if there be any doubt about that in the minds of lawyers—I have not any doubt myself—

Mr. BACON. I am very frank to say to the Senator that I think that proposition is correct.

Mr. FORAKER. If it be correct, then the Senator from Georgia will agree with me that a rate of interest will be found to have been fixed if there be nothing said about it. But what I was going to say is, if there be any doubt about it, I have no objection to a provision similar to that found in the national banking act being incorporated here. I turn to the national banking law, which evidently the Senator from Alabama had not read when he made that statement. I find it there provided, as it occurred to me it was when he referred to it, that the rate of interest to be charged by a national bank shall not be a rate named by the statute creating and authorizing the bank, but the rate authorized by the laws of the State or Territory in which the particular bank is located and doing business.

In the State of Ohio they may charge not higher than 8 per cent, because that is all that may be charged by banks authorized by the State of Ohio, and in the absence of any express contract they will be allowed 6 per cent. So the rate will vary according to the localities in which the business may be carried on. Therefore, Mr. President, this bill is not open to valid objection, especially when the national banking act is taken as a criterion, on the ground that there is no fixed rate of interest provided for in it.

Now, let us look at some of the other objections made. But first let me read the enumeration of the powers of national banks as found in the national banking act. It will be found, as I read them, that the powers conferred upon national banks by the act are, with a single exception, that banks are not by the act made trustees or authorized to become such, quite as extensive as those that are conferred upon the international bank. In the first place, they have power to use a seal and a corporate name, etc., and by such name they may make contracts. We heard quite an outburst of indignation from the Senator from Alabama as he read that this international bank should have power to contract. Did any sovereignty ever create a corporation without conferring that power? Certainly not. That is the first power conferred by Congress upon national banks, the power to contract, and it is a power conferred without any limitation whatsoever, a simple, naked power to make contracts quite as strong, quite as unqualified, as the power that is conferred by this proposed legislation.

It may make contracts, sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law and equity as fully as natural persons; it may elect or appoint directors, and by its board of directors appoint a president, vice-president, cashier, and other officers, define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalty thereof, dismiss said officers or any of them at pleasure, and appoint others to fill their places, and exercise under this act all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits—this bill very severely because it confers upon this proposed bank all the incidental powers necessary to enable it to carry out the business which it was authorized to do.

But before I read further let me answer, The Senator arraigns

Mr. PETTUS. I made no comment on it. I said it gave that power.

Mr. FORAKER. The RECORD will show that to which I refer. I sat near the Senator and I distinctly heard him say that the main objection, the greatest power, was one that had been conferred in a back-handed way.

Mr. PETTUS. That was the power to buy up all other banks.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I misunderstood the Senator. It is all in the same section, and in that same connection he spoke of the incidental powers. Then I am to understand the Senator from Alabama as not objecting, I suppose, to the conference of incidental powers, if the bank is to be created at all, such as are necessary to carry out its purposes?

Mr. PETTUS. Of course I have no objection to that.

Mr. FORAKER. We understood you—I did, and I think other Senators did—to object to the conferring of incidental powers. I will come to the other point presently.

The incidental powers were conferred upon the national banks, and they enjoy them "and exercise under this act all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt."

Now, "by receiving deposits, by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion," and so on.

One of the objections urged against this bank was that it was allowed to receive deposits without any limitation. I do not suppose any bank was ever limited as to the amount of deposits it should receive. But if so, that is an objection which might be made to the charter of the national banks, for that power is conferred upon the national banks without any limitation, and properly so. Why should not a bank be allowed to receive all the money that the patrons of the bank may see fit to confide to it for safe-keeping? It seems to me that one could not speak as the Senator from Alabama has spoken with respect to this matter unless he was without an adequate and appropriate appreciation of the place among the business institutions of this country that the banks necessarily fill. I want to read all the rest of the provision:

By loaning money on personal security; by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of this act; and its board of directors shall also have power to define and regulate, by by-laws, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, the manner in which its stock shall be transferred, its directors elected or appointed, its officers appointed, its property transferred, its general business conducted, and all the privileges granted by this act to associations organized under it shall be exercised and enjoyed; and its usual business shall be transacted at an office or banking house located in the place specified in its organization certificate.

In other words, we find in reading the enumerated powers of the national banks that, with the single exception I have indicated, they are practically the same as are the powers conferred by this bill upon this proposed international bank, and the fact is that the powers conferred upon the international bank were put into this bill with a copy of the powers conferred upon the national banks before the man who drafted it.

This provision was taken from that. There were some changes in phraseology, but no change in spirit, and there was no extension of the power to the corporation except only that upon which I have commented, and this other power that I now come to speak of, the great power which was put in in a left-handed or back-handed way, as the Senator told us, the power to purchase and hold shares of the capital stock of any foreign corporation authorized to transact banking business in foreign countries. That, we are told, means that this international bank, with a $5,000,000 capital, or with its $25,000,000, if in the course of time it should come to be increased to that amount, is to buy up all the banks in the whole world. Mr. President, such a statement as that or such a suggestion as that it seems to me does injustice to the Senator from Alabama. He certainly could not have thought—

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Does not the bill give the bank that power?

Mr. FORAKER. The bill gives to the bank the power to own shares in foreign banks.

Mr. PETTUS. In all of the banks?

Mr. FORAKER. In foreign countries. It can not buy any shares in any bank in this country. The purpose of that must be manifest to every man who ever did transact any business, to every man who ever lived in the commercial world and had any relation to it. When this bank goes with its branch agency down into Mexico or into Venezuela or Argentina or to Chile it must at once, or it will so desire at least, engage in business. It may become essential to its success there that it shall buy some of the shares of some bank or all the shares of some bank that is already there. We want this bank not only to be, to exist, but we want it to be successful. We want it to have all the authority necessary to make its business successful when they may carry it on in foreign countries. They will have enough disadvantages to contend with. It seems to me that that is not an unreasonable provision, and that it is a ridiculous and absurd suggestion that because it has that power, manifestly an appropriate one for it to have under the circumstances, it will go up and down throughout the world outside the United States and outside of Alabama buying the stock in all the banks that can be found, right and left, here and there, and everywhere.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTUS. The Senator from Ohio has the right to criticize, but he ought not to misrepresent me.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to misrepresent the Senator from Alabama; and if he will state wherein I have misrepresented him, I will gladly make the correction.

Mr. PETTUS. I will. The Senator represented me as saying that the bank would do that. I made no such representation. I represented that you gave them the power to do it. That is all I represented.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, and you have the power yourself to do it, so far as free agency is concerned; but I do not believe that it would be possible for you to do it, or desirable for you to do it, or that you would undertake to do it. In regard to this, as to all other things, we must not lose our reason. We must look at the situation as it practically exists. The Senator is not going to buy up all the stock of all the banks of the world. He would not, because he does not want that stock. He has such a horror of aggregated capital that he would not have that stock if they would give it to him, and I suppose he could not buy it if he wanted to for the lack of funds; and for the same reason that he would not buy it neither would the international American bank to be incorporated under this statute which we are about to enact, as I hope we will enact it, go and buy up all the stock of all the other banks in all the other countries of the world. It would engage in the business it is authorized to do; and what would it want with stock in a bank in Germany, or stock in a bank in Austria, or stock in a bank in Spain, or stock in a bank in France, or in any other country in the world, except where it was engaged in the business we authorize? It is likely to want—and it is because it is likely to want it that we have so provided here—stock in the banks of countries where it may locate its agencies to transact its business, and because it is likely to want that stock it ought to have the power. It is not going to acquire stock unless it will be to its advantage to acquire it.

Mr. President, there will not be any increase of the capital stock of this bank, unless there is a need for extended banking facilities—unless the business demands it. The men who engage in the banking business do not needlessly, nor for the sake of tyrannizing over somebody, put their money into an enterprise like this. The names of the men who are recited as incorporators in this bill ought to be a guaranty not only that they are in serious earnest, but that they are men of uprightness of character; men who want to do a legitimate business; men who will try to make their enterprise a business success, of course, but men who will not undertake to deprive anybody of any of his rights under the law, or aid in the supposed endeavors that were referred to by the Senator from Alabama, to send this country on the road that Rome went, to the overthrow and destruction of the Republic. Such talk as that, Mr. President, seems to me to be without any warrant whatever or without any excuse whatever.

Another complaint was—and I speak of these matters simply because they were relied upon by the Senator from Alabama—that the term for which this franchise is granted was changed, as shown by the committee's amendment, from twenty to fifty years. That was due simply to the fact, which I think every business man can appreciate, that twenty years, although a long time in some respects, is not a long time in the life of a corporation, not a long time when it comes to an investment of money, not a long time when it comes to the building up of an enterprise that is to be scattered over this country by these branches as here proposed and scattered over other countries as here proposed. This enterprise could hardly be successfully launched until half the period of the franchise, if it were only twenty years, would have expired. No business man who has money to invest would care to invest his money in the risk and hazards of such an enterprise if almost as soon as they got over the difficulties of starting they would be obliged to apply for another franchise, when possibly they would find a majority of the Senate in accord with the views of the Senator from Alabama, and thus be denied all recognition and reasonable consideration, even to the right to longer live.

Another objection was that this bill provides for an unlimited number of branch agencies in this country, to be created eight at a time. I am not going to stop to comment upon that. I simply ask Senators to read the bill, and they will see the language in the bill is that the bank may establish agencies, but it never shall have more than eight in existence at any one time, not that they shall establish eight to-day and eight to-morrow and eight next year and eight some other time.

Another objection was that we were required to keep, as I understood the Senator—I hope I may have his attention here, because, as I said a while ago, I do not want to misrepresent him—I understood him to say that the reserve was limited to 25 per cent of the capital stock. If I am in error about that, I hope he will correct me. The Senator made that statement while commenting upon the eighth clause of section 7, which contains a provision "to loan money on personal security, subject to the limits hereinafter imposed, and to borrow money," and so forth, and so on.

The reserve, Mr. President, is not 25 per cent of its capital stock, but 25 per cent of its deposits, whatever they may be, and that, as I stated yesterday in the colloquy that here ensued, has been held by those engaged in the banking business, who have no interest whatever in this proposed bank, to have been proven by experience to be a sufficient reserve.

I do not wish to detain the Senate longer. I only want to say, in conclusion, that the Committee on Foreign Relations have given to this bill their most careful consideration. They examined all the questions that were brought to their attention in regard to it—the legal questions, the question of policy, the question of trade, the question of the results likely to flow from it. They took everything into the most careful consideration, and then, by a unanimous vote, reported the bill with the amendments as shown when the bill was brought under consideration yesterday.

We believed it to be a good measure; we believed that this country ought to establish an international American bank. There was a difference of opinion in the committee as to whether this bank should be authorized to do business alone in the Western Hemisphere, or whether it should be authorized to do business also in the Orient, in China, in Japan, and in other countries. I was of the opinion that it ought to be without limitation in that respect, for I do not know any reason why, if we are to have an international bank for the purpose of facilitating exchanges and promoting our international commercial relations, it should be limited in any respect whatever as to the field of its operations. It will not go where there is not a necessity for it, and wherever there is a necessity for it, there it ought to go.

I hope, Mr. President, I have not passed over any of the objections of the Senator from Alabama which give any concern to anyone. I have tried to answer all of them as well as I might be able to, and I believe I have answered all of them; at least a reference to my notes does not suggest any other points than those I have already commented upon.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I do not desire to reply to the sneers of the Senator from Ohio as to my ignorance. I do not profess to be a banker. I have no doubt that he has a thousand times more knowledge on that subject than I have, and I have no doubt that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has a thousand times more than he has. [Laughter.] But it is that very wisdom that I have been complaining about. I do not intend to reply, however, or make any objection further. I rose simply for the purpose of moving an amendment to the bill. I move to amend paragraph No. 8, on page 11, by adding at the end of that paragraph:

Provided, It shall be unlawful for said bank to contract for or receive interest on any loan or forbearance at a greater rate than 6 per cent per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 61, paragraph 8, section 7, page 11, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, It shall be unlawful for said bank to contract for or receive interest on any loan or forbearance at a greater rate than 6 per cent per annum.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the demand? [A pause.] In the opinion of the Chair, the demand is not seconded, but five Senators rising.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that there should be a quorum present, and then perhaps more Senators will vote on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for a vote on my amendment by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word in relation to this bill. I have listened with much interest, as I always do, to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] in his diagnosis, if I may use that term, or his criticisms of this bill. If it had in it provisions such as he has stated, I do not see how any of us could consistently vote for the measure.

It is true I have only given the bill a cursory reading this afternoon, because I was prepared to accept the report of the committee who have had it under consideration for some time, and who have examined it in its legal aspects and also from a commercial standpoint with that care which that committee gives to every measure emanating from it.

The statement of the Senator from Alabama which first attracted my attention was that the proposed bank was only required to keep on hand 25 per cent of its capital stock. A bank might organize and have a very small capital stock, and, like the Chemical Bank of New York, and banks in some other cities, quadruple the capital, aye, increase it a hundredfold; but I think my friend from Alabama is mistaken, for I can find no such provision. On page 24, section 22, there is the same provision which is found in the national-bank law, and a similar custom prevails in all commercial banks, that they shall keep on hand at least 25 per cent in coin or cash of the amount of their liabilities to their depositors. Many conservative banks keep on hand 10 or 15 per cent above the 25 per cent required, but no prudent manager will permit his deposits or the money on hand to run below 25 per cent of the deposits, and that is the case whether it be a private bank, a State bank, or any other commercial organization which receives deposits.

In giving this bill a hasty and cursory reading it seems to me it does not delegate to the people therein named any special privileges, any rights or any powers that they could not obtain from a charter from any State in this Union, or which they could not obtain under our national-bank laws; but its object, if I read the language correctly, is to establish commercial agencies in other nations, where they are not familiar with our mode and manner of transacting business. So these people come here and say, "We want this bank given a national prestige," not by asking the indorsement of the Government, not asking our Government to guarantee anything, not asking our Government to become responsible for one dollar of any liabilities this bank may incur, for that is expressly provided for; but it says in its charter here, "We are not permitted to organize when we subscribe for our stock without paying 10 per cent down," and there can not be a meeting of the stockholders for the purpose of organizing until 25 per cent has been paid on the 50,000 shares subscribed for. In other words, there must be $1,250,000 in the treasury of private funds subscribed by those who organize this bank before it can open its doors to commence business.

Then what does the bill say? If the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] will pardon me for one moment, because he did not refer to it, it is simply said in this bill, "We want to do our business here upon commercial principles; we want to conduct our business here; we know it has the confidence of our own neighbors and of the people who know us; our standing in the commercial world is well known and understood, but we want to stand that way in other countries." If a merchant in New York wishes to go to Japan with a letter of credit to buy tea, we want that letter of credit as good as though it were issued by Drexel, Morgan & Co., or some well-known London firm, the Bank of England, or the Bank of France. If they go to Chile or Peru to buy the products of either of those countries, if they go to Brazil to buy coffee, or if they go to any other country of the world, they want their letters of credit to stand as high as those of any other commercial bank in the world, and in order to give confidence to them the bill says the Comptroller of the Treasury shall revise and review and examine their books and accounts. It is made obligatory upon them to make five reports annually, and for every day they fail to do it over the time prescribed they will have to pay $100 penalty.

But, more than that, the Comptroller of the Currency can at any time go into their banking house, examine their accounts, and ascertain whether their statements are correct or not. That is a notice to the commercial world that it is a business organization which is conducted upon business principles; that it is carried on in accordance with the laws of this country, and that an officer of the United States Government has at least five times in the year reviewed their accounts, examined their books, and verified their statements.

That seems to me the only advantage that the incorporators of this bank can have under this bill. I do not see where it creates a monopoly, where it creates such a great trust as that to which my friend from Alabama has referred. If it did, I would join hands with him in voting against the bill; but the Pan-American Congress assembled in this city, composed of representative men from different countries, especially from Mexico, South America, and commercial men from the Pacific coast, and other commercial men of this country, met together, and said, "We ought to reach out and have this discount business in our own country, in our own bank; and in order to do so there should be some organization as to which the Government of the United States can say, 'We have examined its affairs and we know its statements to be correct.'"

I know it is popular to cry out against trusts and monopolies, and I believe it is our duty to prevent such organizations from taking advantage of the public. I believe it is our duty to vote against any measure which is calculated to give any special powers, or any special privileges, or any special rights whereby the people can be imposed upon, as my friend from Alabama has so vividly portrayed to us; but I do think, from the cursory examination I have given this bill, that the Senator is mistaken.

So far as his amendment is concerned, I am perfectly willing to vote for it. No possible harm can come from it. He is an eminent lawyer, and he knows very well that in many of the States they have usury laws, and that one can not make a bill or a note which will pay above the maximum rate of interest fixed by the law of the particular State. But the Senator also knows that the laws of discount do not reverence the statutory law, and that if my note is given for $100 and the bank says, "I have no money to loan you at the legal rate of 4 or 5 or 6 per cent, but I will discount it for you for so much money," the usury law fails to meet it. It is the law of supply and demand. It is the man or the combination of men which have the money which will demand the rate of interest. It is as wheat is to-day. If it can be cornered and controlled, or if cotton can be controlled, those who control it will either make the money or lose it, dependent upon the supply and demand in the market.

Therefore I believe that the only advantage this bill will give to these incorporators over a State bank or a national bank is that it is notice to the commercial world of other nations that the business affairs of this bank are reviewed, scrutinized, and certified as being in accordance with the statements made by the bank. They must put up their money in the bank before they can loan one dollar or receive one dollar of deposits. I would have made it 50 per cent, if I had been in the committee, instead of 25 per cent; but, nevertheless, they are responsible, as the courts have held time and time again, for whatever amount they may have subscribed for.

The people who are going into this banking organization are going into it for legitimate business, I assume, for there is nothing to be gained except by a fair, legitimate business, and there is nothing in the bill that I can see that gives any special privileges or will permit any monopoly or combination or trust.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word about this bank. I am very much surprised at the objections made to it. It is nothing more or less than a mere instrumentality for the promotion of our export trade. That is all it is. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] yesterday alluded to the fact that the Congress of American Republics, after careful consideration, recommended as essential to the commercial interests between this Republic and those Republics to the south of us an international bank just like this.

Now, within the last five years we have found out conclusively that we must have a foreign market for our manufactured goods or we must cut down wages and stop production, for to-day we can in nine months manufacture every dollar's worth of goods that our people can possibly consume in a year, even though the times are good and wages fair. The balance of the goods must certainly be exported. If not the markets are broken, our mills cut down wages, and we find ourselves in a very serious condition from a business point of view.

About five years ago, when this was learned—and it was then learned first—the manufacturers of the United States formed an association. The association took in every State in the United States; it took in all the manufacturers from Georgia and from Alabama, and it has been engaged industriously from the formation of the league up to now not in creating trusts, not in creating monopolies, but in opening up avenues of trade through which we might send our surplus products and thus relieve the Republic. Two years ago it sent a commission of twenty-five of the leading manufacturers of this country to explore all the South American Republics. I regret to say that the commission were obliged to take two months of time to go there, by crossing the ocean twice, and they were obliged to take two months of their time to get home, by again crossing the ocean twice. I regret that. I am in hopes that will be remedied in the future. This war is going to teach us many things, I think.

Those twenty-five men went down there and investigated this matter with great care. They returned, and they unanimously recommended as one of the absolutely necessary instruments for commerce with the South American Republics this international bank.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Conceding what the Senator has stated to be true, in what respect would a bank chartered by the State of New York for this purpose lack all the power to accomplish what is desired?

Mr. FRYE. Every Senator knows that a bank clothed with power and authority by the United States of America carries with it ten times the influence, the respect, the confidence possessed by a bank authorized by any State of the United States.

Mr. BACON. And that is the purpose?

Mr. FRYE. That is the purpose, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BACON. That is the point.

Mr. FRYE. It gives it respect and confidence, and the very provisions of the bill entitle this bank to respect and confidence.

Mr. President, I say it is an instrumentality for commerce and nothing else; and what is the objection to the United States giving it that character which shall command the respect of the nations and authorize the bank to loan its funds and do business as does the Bank of Great Britain in Argentina and Rio Janeiro? Great Britain has banks in those two countries and so has Germany. We paid Great Britain last year for exchange alone on what little miserable business we do with South America over $2,000,000. Why should this great nation do that? Why not have our own bank? I am sorry to see that there are objections to the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not believe our commerce or our exports are suffering for want of banking facilities. There is not a bank in any great city in the United States that can not, if there is a demand for exchange on any foreign city, provide for it. It is not necessary that it should have authority from the United States to do it. It is one of the incidents of banking. Private bankers can do it as well as public bankers, and I do not believe we have failed to sell goods to South America because there was any difficulty in transmitting the money that we would get for the goods from South America to the United States. What has been our trouble is that we have not had any direct communication from the United States to South America. We have been compelled to go to Great Britain. If a South American wants to send an order, he sends it to London and then to New York.

This is not going to relieve the difficulty, in my opinion, at all. I admit that there is the difficulty the Senator talks about; that we have not such relations as to induce them to buy of us, but we will never have that until we have ships running directly from our great cities to the South American ports.

I can not myself see in this bill the slightest thing that any great bank of New York may not do just as well. I do not believe myself this bank will have any higher credit than some of the great banks of New York City have—not a bit. I think myself it is somewhat doubtful whether we have authority to pass an act of this kind and make it effective except as a District of Columbia organization. Then if it wants to do business in New York, it can do it with the consent of the State of New York and not without it. If it wants to do business in the South American countries, it can do it there with the consent of the South American countries just the same as a New York bank would have to get the consent and on the same terms precisely.

Mr. GRAY. Or a Colorado bank.

Mr. TELLER. Or a Colorado bank.

Mr. GRAY. Or a Delaware bank.

Mr. TELLER. Or a Delaware bank, or any other bank—a private bank. That does not make any difference. Many private banks now do business all over the world; in London, at least. They make their arrangements with some bank in Calcutta or Bombay or Hongkong or Shanghai or any other place by which they draw on them, and those people, on the other hand, draw upon them. That can be just as well done under our present system of banking as under this bank; and if the Senator from Maine wants to encourage exports, he will have to devise some other scheme, in my judgment, than this. I do not believe it will ever send an extra pound of cotton out of this country or a bushel of wheat. I do not believe anybody in South America fails to buy our products because there is a difficulty in transmitting the money here to pay for them, but because there is difficulty in getting our goods there. That is what is the trouble.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it may seem to be a very simple thing to incorporate a bank, but it is a very serious thing if we are going to reverse the policy of the last sixty years and if we are going to do that which will be in fact an evasion of the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution. Nobody will dispute the fact, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that Congress has the right to charter a bank to do business in the District of Columbia, but if there is anything which has been settled by the adjudications of the Supreme Court, as we learned in the debate which occurred here upon the war revenue bill, it is that the Congress of the United States is not clothed by the Constitution with the power to incorporate a company outside of the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, unless such corporation is to be clothed with a governmental function.

I will not stop now to read the authorities. They were read here in abundance recently in the hearing of the Senate. Senators who favor this bill have recognized those adjudications, and consequently they have tried to point out in a vague and indefinite way the fact that this corporation is designed to perform some governmental function. It is so expressed by them; and yet when the question is asked, "Put your finger upon the particular provision in the charter which clothes this corporation with the function to be performed at the instance and for the benefit of the Government," it is not pointed out.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think the Senator from Georgia could have been in the Chamber when in the course of my remarks a few minutes ago I dwelt upon the point made by him yesterday when I was asked to designate the express provision in the proposed statute that clothes this bank with a governmental function. I read an authority, a decision of our Supreme Court, to the effect that it is not necessary to express in a statute the governmental function which the statute is designed to authorize the agency created by the Government to perform; that it is for the court to determine whether or not the corporation, by the power conferred upon, does in fact do anything that can be construed or justly held by the court to be in the nature of a regulation of commerce. I do not think the Senator could have heard the decision.

In that connection I pointed out that the proposed statute does, as decided in other cases to which I called attention, regulate and deal with commerce in the sense that negotiable instruments, drafts, and bills of exchange are instrumentalities, to use the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, necessary in the consummation of these transactions which our people are having with the people of other countries, and anything that relates to these instrumentalities is in the nature of a regulation of commerce. Of course it is only in that sense—it has never been claimed in any other—that this is an agency created by the Government to aid in the regulation of commerce among the States and with foreign countries.

Mr. BACON. I understand. I did hear the Senator from Ohio state that proposition, and I heard him read an authority upon it. I understand the proposition of the Senator to be this, then, that the fact that a bank is clothed with the power to issue bills of exchange and other instrumentalities by which commerce is carried on between different countries clothes it with such a governmental function in the regulation of commerce as puts it within the jurisdiction of Congress to charter such an institution. If that proposition is correct—

Mr. FORAKER. The bank is required to make provision for the issuing of bills of exchange and for all these branches that are to be established in other countries. The bank is required to do those things which are essential to the facilitating of our business.

Mr. BACON. If that proposition is true, then it is true that in all cases Congress has the constitutional power to charter banks, because all banks deal in those things which create these agencies by which interstate and foreign commerce is carried on.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will pardon me, all banks do not have the authority, as I undertook to say yesterday, to establish, by reason of the powers conferred upon them in their charter, branches in other States than those States in which they are chartered, and especially are they without power to establish branches and conduct business in other countries; and the Congress is the only body in all this country—I mean there is no State legislature with such authority—which has authority to confer any such power upon any incorporated company.

Mr. BACON. I utterly deny the proposition that this Government can confer upon a corporation any greater powers to be exercised beyond the borders of this jurisdiction than the State can confer upon a corporation, and I read from a decision which I cited yesterday from memory. I now have it before me.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not mean to state the proposition exactly as the Senator from Georgia has stated it. If he will allow me to interrupt him, I did not mean to say that a corporation created by a State, for instance, could not, by the comity of another State, go into that State and there transact the same kind of business that it was authorized to transact at home. But I do not believe, for instance, that a bank chartered by the State of Georgia could, within the contemplation of that charter, legitimately go into the State of Kentucky and there establish and carry on a banking business, unless the Senator has something in his constitution and laws governing the granting of general charters very different from what we have in our State.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator, then, to state as a general proposition that a bank chartered in one State can not do business in another State, unless that bank is specifically authorized in its charter so to do, and that when so authorized it can do it.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not say at all that they can not transact any business. Of course, if they loaned money to a man who would go off into another State and refuse to pay it, they could follow him there and sue him. They could transact such business as might be necessary to carry on their business in that respect; but I mean to say that it is not within the contemplation of the charter, at least ordinarily, that they should establish a bank in the State where they are chartered and another bank in each of the other forty-four States.

Mr. BACON. Agencies in the other States?

Mr. FORAKER. I mean banks. They may have an agent possibly in some particular case for some particular business, but what I say is this: Take my own State, for illustration, for I know what the constitution and laws are in that particular and generally. I do not believe that a State bank chartered to do business in the State of Ohio could, in addition to establishing its banking house and conducting its business within that State, go also into each and every other State in the Union by virtue of the power conferred upon it by its charter from Ohio, and in each and every other State establish a bank and conduct business as though there incorporated. Of course they would have to do it by comity if at all. But even in that way I think it would be ultra vires to go and do business in that manner.

Mr. BACON. When the Senator speaks about going into another State and establishing a bank, I do not suppose he means what he says. If when he says "establish a bank" he means establish an independent bank, a bank complete of itself, that can only be done by the authority of the jurisdiction in which it is proposed to set it up.

Mr. FORAKER. Ah, but—

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, does the Senator understand that this bill authorizes not only the establishment of a bank in the District of Columbia, but that under this charter an independent bank can be established in every other State?

Mr. FORAKER. Not at all. I am talking about the supposititious case which the Senator put a while ago of a bank undertaking to do business in other States than the State in which it was chartered, and I am not talking about the actual case before us, which provides for one principal office and such number of branch banks as may be established, all belonging to the same corporation.

Mr. BACON. Nobody that I know of ever suggested any other expansion of a parent bank except in the way last indicated by the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I can put it plain enough so that there certainly can not be any difference as to the facts we are talking about. I do not believe, for instance, that a bank chartered under the law of Minnesota, authorized by the charter of that State to carry on the banking business in that State, could also, in addition to having its bank there, go to the city of New York and there engage in the banking business, keeping a banking house there and conducting a banking business. I may be in error about it, but I do not believe that any corporate authority to do that would be conferred by the charter granted by the State, at least not under our constitution.

Mr. BACON. I have great respect for the Senator from Ohio, but he is certainly mistaken in that proposition. That question was settled in the case which I cited from memory yesterday and which I now hold in my hand, that of the Bank of Augusta against Earle, in 13 Peters, in which there is a very learned and elaborate discussion of the question of extraterritorial powers upon the part of a bank, in an opinion delivered in behalf of the court by Chief Justice Marshall, and in which the doctrine is clearly laid down that while it is true that a corporation is limited in its powers to the jurisdiction of the authority by which it is created, it nevertheless can, with the consent, express or implied, of other jurisdictions, exercise in those jurisdictions all the corporate powers which are granted to it by the parent from which it derives its being, of course subject to the limitation that there must be no power exercised in that foreign jurisdiction conflicting with the law in that jurisdiction.

Mr. FORAKER. In other words, if the Senator will allow me, as I understand that decision (it is one with which every lawyer is familiar), the consent granted to the bank to do business in a foreign jurisdiction was held to be the equivalent of a charter from that jurisdiction upon those terms.

Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. FORAKER. That makes a wholly different case from that which we have been talking about.

Mr. BACON. No, it is exactly what I have been saying all the time; but the Senator has been putting a case which did not exist. When he spoke about there being an independent bank as a branch of the original bank, of course it must be a branch and nothing else.

Mr. FORAKER. But, if the Senator will allow me, the point I make is that it does not get the power to go into the other State by the charter from the State in which it is incorporated, but by comity, which, when consent is granted, is the equivalent of a new charter granted by the State without regard to the other.

Mr. BACON. It is not the equivalent of a new charter. It is true it gets the right to exercise those powers by the consent of the State in which it exercises them, but the fact that it has the power is due to the charter granted to it by the parent from which it derived its being. There can be no possible doubt about that question.

The point I am coming to is this: If there is to be the grant of this charter, there ought to be a good reason for it. If it be true that it was not within the original design that the Federal Government should engage in the granting of corporate powers to companies, to be exercised outside of its immediate jurisdiction—outside of the District of Columbia and the Territories, I mean—then there ought to be apparent some reason for the exercise of such a power at this time as will show that it is necessary that it should be done, even if there is a doubt about the power, conceding for the purpose of argument that it is proper that it should be done. I want to analyze and see what is the necessity.

In the first place, I go back to the proposition which I was endeavoring to state when I got into the colloquy with the Senator from Ohio, that there is no possible power which the United States Government can confer upon this company to be exercised outside of the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States that could not be conferred upon it by the State of New York, and I stand upon that as a legal proposition. I say it can not possibly be controverted that the State of New York has the power to confer upon a company chartered by it every power to be exercised either within the State of New York or outside of the State of New York, that the United States Government could confer upon a company chartered for that purpose.

Mr. FORAKER. I take issue with the Senator upon that proposition in this way: I say that the State of New York may charter a bank. I see there is some difference of opinion among the lawyers here who have expressed themselves in regard to this matter. My idea is that the State of New York has no power to authorize a bank to do a banking business outside of its territorial jurisdiction. It may go beyond the State and so engage by comity, if allowed to do so by the other States; but the National Government does have authority to incorporate a bank that can do business in the District of Columbia or in the State of New York or any other State, if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. BACON. Or in any foreign country?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; except by comity. Of course that is a matter of convention. But the Senator will remember that from the beginning my contention has been that there were two reasons why this bank should be incorporated by the National Government instead of by some State, one being that no State can give to a bank incorporated by it authority to go, without regarding the wishes of that other State, into another State in this country to do business. I claim that the National Government can give this bank that power, because in the way I have pointed out it is discharging a Government purpose in the promotion of our trade with other countries, thereby assisting in the regulation of commerce.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I suggest that while of course I am very glad to be interrupted and delighted to answer any question to the extent of my ability, I can not possibly present an argument if the Senator interjects between each proposition an argument upon his side. I say it with the utmost kindness.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg pardon. The Senator ought not to look at me so appealingly and invitingly. He has such a gracious and inviting way that it is impossible to resist the temptation to answer him.

Mr. BACON. The Senator answers in such an exceedingly pleasant way that it is with very great reluctance that I ask him to let me proceed with some degree of continuity. I understand the proposition of the Senator to be this, and I hope I may have his attention even if I do run the risk of interruption.

Mr. FORAKER. I am always delighted to give the Senator my attention.

Mr. BACON. I understand the proposition of the Senator to be this, and I am glad he has made it clear, that one purpose of this charter is to incorporate a banking company which, according to his contention, will have the right to do business in each and every State of this Union, not by the consent of that State, but without the consent of that State and in spite of the denial of that State.

Mr. FORAKER. In each State, so far as authorized by the charter. It allows only eight different locations from branches.

Mr. BACON. The Senator picks out the particular States. Is that it?

Mr. FORAKER. I dislike to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BACON. It is all right. I asked the question.

Mr. FORAKER. The charter provides that this bank shall have its principal office in the city of Washington or in New York and eight branch offices located at such points as its directors may select, to be approved, etc.

Mr. BACON. The proposition is that so far as these eight States in which the branches are to be located are concerned, the corporation is to have the right to do business not by virtue of the comity of the States or by their consent, but by virtue of the command of the Federal Government that it shall have it.

Mr. FORAKER. That is my view of it.

Mr. BACON. I say that proposition is utterly without authority in any provision of the Constitution. We are not to deal in refinements. If the argument of the learned Senator is correct, then the general proposition is practically established that it is within the power of the Federal Government, by any peculiar provisions which it may see proper to insert in a charter, to impose upon States, regardless of the wishes and consent of those States, corporations to do a banking business within the confines of those States.

Mr. FORAKER. I dislike to do so, but will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. My contention is what I have stated it to be, because, in my opinion, this bank is to discharge governmental functions in the sense in which I have explained. It is an agency established by the Government to be used in the regulation of commerce among the States and with foreign countries, and therefore something that is within the purview of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon the Congress, and whenever it comes to the establishment of that kind of an agency, that being admitted, I think the Senator from Georgia will agree with me that that kind of an agency may go into any State.

Mr. BACON. With all due respect to the Senator from Ohio, I desire to say that I regard the proposition that this is for the purpose of performing a governmental function as a mere device to get a charter from the Government of the United States for an altogether different purpose.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me a moment—

Mr. FORAKER. No; what I want to say was that that, of course, is a matter of opinion.

Mr. BACON. I was going to give my reason for it.

Mr. FORAKER. As a matter of opinion your argument is legitimate. My proposition was, conceding the character of the organization to be what I have claimed for it, you would certainly agree that it could go into any State without regard to the wish of the State.

Mr. BACON. Yes; if it was in good faith chartered for a distinctly governmental purpose to carry on a governmental function, like the carrying of the mails, for instance, or the transportation of troops, if you please, or for any other thing of that kind, which would be a different matter.

Mr. HARRIS. Which the State could not do.

Mr. BACON. Which the State could not do, as suggested by the Senator from Kansas most pertinently. But where it is in no essential particular different from any other bank, and where it is proposed to clothe it nominally with other functions simply for the purpose of endeavoring to take it out of a general rule, then it is a very different matter.

Mr. President, I was proceeding to say when the Senator interrupted me that in my opinion these particular features which were ingrafted upon this bill, by which it was sought to establish the fact that it was framed for a governmental purpose, constitute simply a device for the purpose of getting a charter from the Government, not that these governmental functions might be performed, but for a very different purpose, and that purpose is the one stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

There is but one point in which this bank will differ from a bank chartered by a State. There is no power which it can perform but what can be performed by a bank chartered by a State. As stated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], there is now no trouble about exchange between this country and foreign countries through the instrumentalities of existing banks in the States and the national banks. There is no trouble about getting exchange on South America. Every man who has ever traveled to Europe and has taken a letter of credit knows it well—that it is good for a thousand pounds, for instance, and upon the back of it is printed the name of every important town in the whole world. There is not a city of importance in Europe, Asia, Africa, or South America the name of which is not upon the back of that letter of credit. There is not a single one of those cities in the four continents (and if you want to do so you can embrace America) in which the holder of that bill of exchange can not go and get his money by simply writing his name upon it and giving a receipt for it. I say the contention that there is a necessity for this bank in order that exchange may be facilitated can not be supported by any fact. It is not true in point of fact.

So, Mr. President, I say there is another reason. What is the reason? It can not be that originally suggested by the Senator from Maine, that it is for the purpose of enlarging our markets. The Senator from Colorado has answered that suggestion. There is but one purpose, and I say that is a purpose not justified by any legitimate use of the powers we hold under the Constitution of the United States. That purpose is to incorporate a bank which shall have in its name and in its powers the prestige and authority of the Government of the United States. There is nothing else in it, Mr. President. If you should take that out of it I would not give a bawbee for the bill. There is nothing else in it. There is no power which this bank can exercise, I repeat, that it could not exercise if it held the charter from the State of New York. The sole purpose, the controlling purpose, the purpose without which the charter would not be worth the paper it was written on, so far as any commercial value is concerned, is that the name and authority and prestige of this great Government may be given to a private corporation.

Mr. President, if it had been designed originally that the Government should go into that business, there would have been no doubt about it; it would have been given that power or it would have been found in some of the implied powers. But the Supreme Court of the United States says that in conferring power upon Congress it was not designed that it should have the power to grant corporate life, and that it could only be justified where some great governmental function was to be performed which could not be performed by a State or by the agency of a State. If that is true, ought we to pass this charter?

Senators say they are surprised that we should stand here to defend the rights of other national banks. Well, Mr. President, so long as they are legal, so long as they are authorized and sustained by the law of the land, they are entitled to be protected. And they are not the only banks. Some of the greatest banks in this country are not national banks. Is it proper that we should here set up a great, gigantic bank which is to enter into competition with every other bank in the United States? When all other banks hold their corporate powers from the State except the present national banks, which are of a very different character from that of the bank now proposed to be chartered, is it proper that they should all be brought into competition with this gigantic bank, backed up with the name and authority and the prestige of the great Government of the United States? I asked the Senator, if that is so desirable, whether it ought not to be made a general law, so that other parties, if they see proper to create banks of this kind, might have the opportunity so to do. The Senator said that in the committee he favored a provision of that kind, but the Senator did not say he would be willing to ingraft upon this bill a provision by which other parties might associate themselves together and come in competition with this bank. The Senator said that other parties might come to Congress and by showing that they had the ability and the character, financially and otherwise, to carry on such a gigantic business, they could get charters. Mr. President, if you ever clothe with life this corporation, it will see to it that Congress shall not grant to any other corporation similar powers.

I repeat, as I have had occasion to say once or twice rather in a disconnected way during this discussion, this is one of the gravest questions that have ever come before Congress since I have had the honor to be connected with it. I asked the Senator from Ohio, it is true not in debate, but in private conversation, in what particular does this proposed bank, except in the fact that it can not issue bank bills, differ from the old national bank with which Jackson grappled and which at one time threatened the domination of this whole country, and the Senator was unable to point out any distinctive difference. In view of the history of this country, in view of the great events and the great contentions which grew out of the existence of a national bank in former days, is it so light a matter that we should charter the twin of it upon such light considerations as are suggested here?

Mr. President, I did not expect when I rose to do more than point out the fact that there was no power which could be conferred upon this bank which could not be given it by a State; but I have been by my earnestness in the matter drawn into a much more extended presentation of it than I expected. I regret exceedingly that upon a matter so grave, so wide reaching, so exceedingly serious in the consequences which may follow it, we have had in this discussion a comparatively empty Senate, and that we are to have it voted upon without proper consideration by all the members who have failed to hear the discussion as it has progressed.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to inquire if it would be agreeable to the Senator from Ohio in charge of the pending bill to yield at this time for a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Montana will allow me, I was about to suggest that I do not wish to detain the Senate more than a few moments. I do not wish to make any remarks. I wish to call attention to some authorities, and I would be pleased to have them go into the RECORD immediately following the argument that has just been made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. They are in support of the proposition I was trying to contend for in the very unequal colloquy I had with him.

Mr. CARTER. I understand, then, that it will be agreeable to the Senator immediately after concluding his remarks?

Mr. FORAKER. Immediately after I read these authorities. There are only three of them. In the case of Gloucester Ferry Company vs. Pennsylvania (114 U. S., 203), discussing the question of commerce as used in the Constitution in that clause which authorizes Congress to regulate it, the Supreme Court say:

The power to regulate that commerce—

Among the States—

as well as commerce with foreign nations, vested in Congress, is the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed—that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted; to determine when it shall be free and when subject to duties or other exactions. The power also embraces within its control all the instrumentalities by which that commerce may be carried on and the means by which it may be aided and encouraged. The subjects, therefore, upon which the power may be exerted are of infinite variety.

It embraces all the instrumentalities that may be employed.

In the case of McCall vs. California (136 U. S., 104), Mr. Justice Lamar quotes with approval from Pomeroy's Constitutional Law as follows, speaking of this power:

It includes the fact of intercourse and of traffic and the subject-matter of intercourse and traffic. The fact of intercourse and traffic, again, embraces all the means, instruments, and places by and in which intercourse and traffic are carried on, and further still, comprehends the act of carrying them on at these places and by and with these means. The subject-matter of intercourse or traffic may be either things, goods, chattels, merchandise, or persons. All these may therefore be regulated.

Then, in the case of Railroad Company vs. National Bank (102 U. S., 14), Mr. Justice Clifford said:

Bills of exchange and promissory notes are commercial paper in the strictest sense, and as such must ever be regarded as favored instruments, as well on account of their negotiable quality as their universal convenience in mercantile affairs. Everywhere the rule is that they may be transferred by indorsement, or when indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer they are transferable by mere delivery. International regulations encourage their use as a safe and convenient medium for the settlement of balances among mercantile men of different nations, and any course of judicial decision calculated to restrain or impede their full and unembarrassed circulation for the purposes of foreign or domestic trade would be contrary to the soundest principles of public policy.

There is only one more that I wish to detain the Senate with and call attention to. In the case of Nathan vs. Louisiana (8 Howard, page 73), Mr. Justice McLean said:

Money is admitted to be an instrument of commerce, and so is a bill of exchange; and upon this ground it is insisted that a tax upon an exchange broker is a tax upon the instruments of commerce. * * * No one can claim an exemption from a general tax on his business within the State on the ground that the products sold may be used in commerce.

Those authorities, taken in connection with those I cited in my argument this afternoon, show conclusively, as it seems to me, that bills of exchange and notes and drafts and other commercial paper of the character specified, which this bank is authorized to deal in for the benefit of this trade, are instrumentalities of commerce.

The other authorities which I cited were to the effect that anything affecting and providing for the use of these instrumentalities of commerce was an appropriate regulation of commerce within the meaning of the constitutional provision authorizing Congress to exercise that power. So it is that I say to the Senator from Georgia that we resort to a legitimate device, if he wants to use that term at all. I mean it is not a device in any reprehensible sense, if the word "device" is to be used, but it is perfectly legitimate, if you want to have the benefits of an international bank, chartered by the National Government, to invest it with a power that will bring it within the purview of the Constitution, and it is not a matter to be complained of that it is made constitutional by that kind of a provision.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Of course the Senator will recognize the fact that transportation of goods from one State to another is in the strictest sense interstate commerce.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Then the proposition contended for by the Senator would put it in the power of Congress, as the exercise of one of its legitimate functions, to charter a railroad not for the purpose of carrying the mails, not for the purpose of transporting troops, but because, forsooth, it would be engaged in the transportation of freight from one State to another. That being the case, then, from the beginning of a session through to its conclusion, we should be granting railroad charters from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. FORAKER. One of the opinions of the Supreme Court I read from this afternoon was exactly that; the case of the Cherokee Nation against the Kansas Railway.

Mr. BACON. Is it not there the governmental function of carrying the mails and transporting troops?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; not at all. In the language of the court, the Supreme Court found that the railroad there in question, although chartered by a State, was an agency employed by the National Government in the regulation of commerce between the States because it passed through the Territory and into the adjoining State.

Mr. BACON. I was speaking of the chartering of the company, not of the use.

Mr. FORAKER. Surely if it be competent for the National Government to select a railroad that has already been chartered by a State and make it an agency in the regulation of commerce, it would be competent for the National Government to directly charter that railroad company for that purpose. Let me read again.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator to read it.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, I will. This is the case of the Cherokee Nation vs. The Kansas Railway, 135 United States, 641.

Mr. BACON. That is through a Territory of the United States, not through a State.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, we will see:

Congress has power to regulate commerce not only with foreign nations and among the several States, but with the Indian tribes. It is not necessary that an act of Congress should express in words the purpose for which it was passed.

I read this authority this afternoon in answer to the Senator's question of yesterday, or rather his requirement of yesterday, that I should put my finger upon the express declaration in this bill that it was intended to subserve some specified governmental purpose. It is not necessary, say the Supreme Court, that there should be any such expression. They further say:

The court will determine for itself whether the means employed by Congress have any relation to the powers granted by the Constitution. The railroad which the defendant was authorized to construct and maintain will have, if constructed and put into operation, direct relation to commerce with the Indian tribes, as well as with commerce among the States, especially with the States immediately north and south of the Indian Territory. It is true that the company authorized to construct and maintain it is a corporation created by the laws of a State, but it is none the less a fit instrumentality to accomplish the public objects contemplated by the act of 1884.

That act was an act authorizing it to exercise the power of eminent domain in procuring a right of way through the Indian Territory, and this litigation arose in connection with the effort to convey property for that purpose.

Other means might have been employed, but those designated in that act, although not indispensably necessary to accomplish the end in view, are appropriate and conducive to that end, and therefore within the power of Congress to adopt.

It seems to me that this is a case which absolutely and conclusively disposes of the entire contention of the Senator. It was not expressed in the act that there was any governmental function to be performed, any particular purpose to be subserved, but Congress simply empowered that railroad to exercise the right of eminent domain, and in the exercise of that right this litigation arose and the Supreme Court said the company had a right to go there and do what it was doing, and that Congress had a right to authorize it to go there, because it was an instrumentality employed in connection with interstate commerce.

Mr. BACON. The exercise of the right of eminent domain in a Territory of the United States was the particular point in issue, was it not?

Mr. FORAKER. No, not so.

Mr. BACON. It was litigation over lands in the Indian Territory.

Mr. FORAKER. The litigation, I believe, arose in that way. From what I have read here (there is not enough quoted here, but I had the case here this afternoon), the decision, I imagine, did not rest upon that point at all. The question was whether or not the United States Government could select a corporation chartered by a State and make it an instrumentality in the regulation of commerce and whether or not there was in fact any regulation of commerce, and the Supreme Court of the United States said it did not make any difference that it was chartered by a State instead of by the United States, and that although nothing was said in the act of 1884 about regulating commerce, yet the court could see that it was such regulation, because the road was interstate, and was engaged in facilitating commerce.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, he contends, then, that the principle in that decision would go so far as to have authorized Congress to have conferred the power of eminent domain upon that corporation, to be exercised within the State of Kansas, if it had not that power from the State otherwise? Is that the view the Senator takes of the principle involved in that decision?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator will excuse me; I was trying to find the case, and did not hear his question.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator if the view he takes of the principle in that decision is that the Congress of the United States would have been authorized to have empowered the railroad company to have exercised the right of eminent domain within the State of Kansas if it had been necessary to do so, or if the State of Kansas had not imbued the company with that power?

Mr. FORAKER. Before I answer the Senator I want to get the authority, for fear I have confused the case as to how this litigation arose. I have it here, and by reading from the syllabus you will see in a moment. I find I was right about it. Preceding the quotation that is made, and which I read, occurs the following statement in regard to the case:

In Cherokee Nation vs. Kansas Railway, 135 United States, 641, the Supreme Court sustained a grant of the power of eminent domain to a Kansas corporation, made by act of Congress, in relation to lands in the Indian Territory owned and occupied by an Indian tribe.

I do not see anything that, in my opinion, would warrant the inference that the decision went so far as to authorize Congress to confer the power of eminent domain upon the Kansas corporation, to be exercised within the State of Kansas. I do not suppose it would, unless it was for some governmental agency, like carrying the mails, or something for which it became absolutely necessary. There might be an exception to that rule; I did not attach any importance to how the litigation arose. The important feature of the case is that there was an agency which the National Government did not create, but simply clothed with certain powers, in the exercise of which the controversy occurred which gave rise to litigation, in which the Supreme Court held that because the railroad did go through the Territory and the States to the south and north of it it was an instrument that could be employed in the regulation of commerce; and that idea was not negated by the fact that Congress had not said anything on that point in the statute, in which there was no allusion to the regulation of commerce; no allusion to any agency of Government on the part of this instrumentality.

I regret that I have occupied the time of the Senate so long.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION CALENDAR.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment until I can make a request.

Mr. CARTER. Very well; I will do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask unanimous consent that immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow fifteen minutes be devoted to the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls attention to the notice given by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] for to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Unanimous consent has already been given for the consideration of another matter. I have no objection to the arrangement suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, if it does not conflict with the present unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]?

Mr. PETTUS. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That fifteen minutes may be given to-morrow after the routine morning business for the consideration of the Private Pension Calendar, not to interfere, however, with the notice heretofore given by the Senator from South Dakota for 1 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

CLAIM OF METHODIST BOOK CONCERN SOUTH.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it hereby is, authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to investigate the claim of the Methodist Book Concern South, as authorized by Senate resolution No. 882; and that the necessary expenses incurred therein be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of said committee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 15, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 14, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a correction. On Saturday, in presenting the concurrent resolution giving directions for the enrolling clerk, I remarked, in reply to a question, that certain omissions had probably taken place in enrolling the war revenue bill at the Government Printing Office, as I was then informed was the case. I find, however, that this is by no means certain, and that the omission might have taken place under various circumstances. I desire to add that I have always found the Government Printing Office accurate in its work and excellent in its typography in every direction. I make this remark in justice to the Government Printing Office.

CLAIMS UNDER THE BOWMAN ACT.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill H. R. 4936, an act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, have directed me to report back unanimously that the House nonconcur in all the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take up the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 4936. An act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. There are amendments made by the Senate, and the gentleman asks that the House nonconcur in all the amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. LOUD. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, that the matter should lay over for a day or two.

Mr. MAHON. I think I can explain to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I understand it now, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman can not explain anything. I prefer that the matter should lay over for a day or two. I know that in my State there are three or four million dollars claimed in there, and there is an agreement to put them out, and there is nothing more that the gentleman can explain.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The House is not to blame for that.

Mr. LOUD. Let the House take care of it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

WILLIAM STEPHENSON SMITH.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6209) to pension William Stephenson Smith.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6209) to pension William Stephenson Smith, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

H. R. GIBSON,

V. WARNER,

E. W. MIERS,

Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,

J. O. PRITCHARD,

JOHN L. MITCHELL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the managers on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The committee of conference of the two Houses, after full and free conference, have agreed that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and agree to the same.

The House bill placed the name of William Stephenson Smith on the pension roll, leaving the rate to be determined by the Bureau itself according to the disabilities of the soldier shown to be of service origin.

The Senate amendments limit the pension to $12 per month, and such is the effect of the conference report. The other amendment is merely formal.

Dated June 13, 1898.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
V. WARNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

MOSES PENDERGRASS.

Mr. ROBB. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 242) for the relief of Moses Pendergrass, of Missouri, be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I will state that I introduced a bill similar to this, which was referred to the committee I have just named. This Senate bill, which was referred to the Committee on Claims, was reported back to the House on May 11 with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the reference of Senate bill No. 242, for the relief of Moses Pendergrass, of Missouri, be changed from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The third clause of Rule XXI provides that—No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred except by unanimous consent to any other than the following-named committees.

And the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is not one of the committees named; so that to refer the bill in the manner indicated by the gentleman from Missouri requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that private claims ought to be referred to no other committee than the Committee on Claims or the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

IMPROVING DEEP CREEK, VIRGINIA.

Mr. WISE. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration House concurrent resolution No. 18, directing the Secretary of War to prepare and submit an estimate of the cost of widening and deepening Deep Creek, Virginia, from the south branch of the Elizabeth River to the new lock at the Dismal Swamp Canal. A resolution of this kind has already been adopted by the Senate, and this proposition has received the favorable recommendation of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. DINSMORE. I must ask for the regular order.

HAWAII.

The House, according to order, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] such time as he may require, not exceeding one hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I propose to address myself for a few moments to the consideration of the question involved in the pending resolution. I do not believe that this question can, with propriety or with patriotic devotion to duty, be made a party question, and therefore I shall make no appeal to any member on this side of the House to waive his personal judgment because this is or has been or may be a measure indorsed by a party platform.

From the beginning of the Government down to the present time we have had stormy controversies over the question of acquisition of territory. Starting out with the proposition that there could be no acquirement of territory except by treaty, Mr. Jefferson, with a bold admission that he had no constitutional right to do what he did, made the splendid acquisition that more than any other act of his Administration made his Administration great.

It ought to be said, however, that the first President of the United States was assailed by the same theory of politics that we have had recently proclaimed on this floor. And when the title was settled to the great Northwestern Territory, where freedom was first established by law, and out of which five magnificent States of the Union have been carved, the same question that has been made so eloquently and forcibly on this floor was made in opposition to the acquisition of that splendid territory.

Take the map of the country and imagine, if you can, the opponents of this system of expansion having carried their views into the executive action of the country, and you will discover a United States limited by the Ohio River on the west and by the line of Kentucky down to the point where we strike the Louisiana purchase. And every foot of this mighty domain that has been added to the map of my country by the successive acts of Washington and Jefferson and their great successors has been acquired over the protest and the learned disquisitions upon constitutional law of a great body of men holding the same sentiments that we have heard here during this debate on this floor.

There is no power expressly given to the United States in the Constitution to acquire territory by conquest. It is not stipulated in the Constitution of the United States that we can acquire territory. And yet gentlemen come here and say that they will select out acquisition by treaty, acquisition by conquest, and stop there, and deny to the General Government the power to acquire territory by any way not specifically named in the Constitution. That is the old contest between a strict construction of the Constitution and a liberal construction of the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution.

It is the same thing that at one time arrayed a mighty party in this country against the constitutionality of the appropriation of money by Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Just as wise arguments, just as potential in the matter of learning and eloquence, were made for a quarter of a century upon the floor of these bodies to show that, because it was not written in the Constitution that it was legal and legitimate to appropriate money for the improvement of rivers and harbors, therefore, under a strict construction of the Constitution, we could not appropriate a dollar of money for that purpose. And that was over and over and over again reiterated in the political platform of those days.

So all along the line there has been a growth of constitutional construction which resulted, so far as territorial acquisition is concerned, in this: That the power of Congress being sovereign over the territory of the United States, and this being a sovereign nation, it has inherently self-sustaining power—the right to do any act not prohibited by the Constitution which, in the judgment of Congress, is beneficial and necessary for the preservation, the growth, the development, and the prosperity of the country. There is a platform that sufficiently covers the ground of this argument for my purpose. It not being forbidden that this joint resolution shall be effective and operative, I assign it to the powers in Congress covered by the general declaration of the Constitution that gives to the General Government the power which I have already described.

I regret, therefore, that there should be any attempt made here to make this a political question. It does not affect the passage of this joint resolution. It can not turn back the clock of the age that is striking. America is entering upon the dawn of a new epoch in its history. No party organization can turn back the hands upon that mighty dial. No puny declaration of a party platform can turn aside or silence the voice of the American people upon this mighty question.

Therefore I shall address myself, in the few moments that I shall occupy, not to an appeal to Republicans and not to an appeal to Democrats. If I wished to pave the way for the utter annihilation of the Democratic party as a political organization; if I had the power to make and select issues on which and under which and through which that party should go to an oblivion that the ages would never break the silence of, I would ask them in this heroic hour to plant themselves as a party organization against the pathway that the people of the United States have ordained to travel and which, with the mighty tread of an irresistible host, they are traveling.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the very able speech of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] on Saturday; and while he made but one new proposition, but one point that has not, as I have already shown, been repeated year after year as these instances have arisen, he spoke so earnestly and so ably that I was attracted to his argument and followed it carefully from the beginning to the end. I shall not attempt to reply to the detail of his argument; but I was struck very forcibly by his proposition, which he made with so much emphasis in answer to the general argument upon this side, which he anticipated, that there was at this particular time a military necessity for the acquisition of the Sandwich Islands for the military and naval purposes of the United States.

I had never heard the suggestion made before, and as I listened to him, going forward step by step to demonstrate that there were two harbors away up at the extreme northwest that were situated upon a shorter route of travel from the United States to Hongkong, I was greatly interested; and finally, when he demonstrated the fact to exist that it was something like 860 miles shorter from San Francisco by way of Unalaska to Hongkong and hence to Manila, and then came back to speak of the character of those harbors, I was greatly surprised and greatly interested.

And as he proceeded to demonstrate the result which he had worked out, I began to wonder if there was not some answer to that. I could not deny his statement as to distance. I could not deny his statement as to location. I could not deny any statement that he had made, and it was the deduction that he had drawn from the demonstrated fact that I felt must be answered by the discovery of some new fact, or my side of the case would be found in a difficult position.

I applied to the Navy Department, and, through the Secretary of the Navy, to the Hydrographic Office, and finally to one of the highest authorities in the United States upon this subject, a man well known to all of us, a famous man in this country, famous in this particular section of the globe. I refer to Commodore Melville. Those gentlemen have written out for me some comments upon the proposition made by the gentleman from Arkansas, and I think they will be quite as interesting to the House and to the people of the country as was the very interesting demonstration made by the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas.

In order that these documents may more fully meet the question, I will say that I propose to show by them that, while the distance is correctly stated by the gentleman from Arkansas, while all the material facts are exactly as he gave them, the deduction that he drew from the facts that he stated is wholly wrong, because of additional facts that he did not state and which, of course, I will assume that he was not fully advised of. The proposition struck me as very wonderful in this, that I knew that no merchant ship, as a rule and all the year round, traveled that route, and I knew the general proposition that the commercial marine of the world seeks the best lines of travel.

Nothing is left that is not discovered by them. The steamship lines that depart from New York to all parts of the world, changing their courses under conditions of the different seasons and the storms and the winds, nevertheless always find the best lines and go where the shortest routes are, in connection always, however, with safety and comfort. And knowing, as I thought I knew, as I readily ascertained, at all events, that no commercial traffic was carried by way of these northern harbors, I thought there must be a good reason for it.

I had some knowledge of the course of the vessels sailing in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railroad from Vancouver, and I knew that they even traveled farther south than Honolulu, and I discovered further, without much trouble, that until the great development of the commerce of the Sandwich Islands the rapid lines of transportation from our Pacific coast to Asiatic ports never touched at the Sandwich Islands, but that they kept over some three or four hundred miles south of Honolulu.

Later on, when the traffic of those islands began to develop, they made a deflection to the north, costing them some more miles of travel, but never did they go by way of the northern line which is described in the papers I have here. The reason of it turns out to be that that line of travel furnished no inducement to the mariner excepting the shortness of the distance. But there are existing upon that line of travel absolute obstacles that can not be overcome. Without expending any more time upon the mere question of introduction, I will read the statement prepared by Commodore Melville.

Mr. LOVE. We do not hear the gentleman very well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. With the consent of the House, I will ask the Clerk to read this document, and I want to say that wherever strong language is used it is not my language, and I want to in-dorse the general result of this language and not the language itself.

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorandum for Hon. C. H. Grosvenor, M. C., with respect to the question of the route from San Francisco to Yokohama.

The point has been made in this debate that there is no advantage in having Honolulu as a port of call on the way to Yokohama and Hongkong, inasmuch as Unalaska, which is already in our own Territory, is on the shortest route to the Orient, and therefore we now have a port without annexing any other territory.

This statement is one of those specious half truths which are often worse than absolute errors in deceiving persons who have not possession of all the facts, but I shall now proceed to show that for purposes of commerce this raising the question of Unalaska is a mere farce.

I shall discuss in a few moments the question of the difference in the distance from San Francisco to Yokohama via Honolulu and via Unalaska, but I shall first call attention to the fact that a less desirable port of call than Unalaska would be hard to find. It is situated above the fiftieth parallel of north latitude, and has practically nothing but a harbor to recommend it. There is no trade or commerce, no repair shops; in fact, nothing whatever to attract a great mail steamer proceeding from the metropolis of our Pacific coast to the gateway of the Orient at Yokohama.

Any one at all familiar with the sea is aware that one of the greatest dangers to navigation is fog, and the sea about Unalaska is one of the foggiest regions in the whole world. Probably nearly everybody present has enjoyed reading the poems of Rudyard Kipling known as "The Seven Seas," which include a short one called "The Rhyme of the Three Sealers," and he there depicts in most graphic style the density of the fog which is found in the neighborhood of this port which my friends have advertised as so desirable as a port of call. Of course I have not rested content with Mr. Kipling's poem alone, but have taken pains to verify the statements there made by inquiring of naval officers and others who have spent considerable time near the Aleutian group, and they have told me that Mr. Kipling's picture is not overdrawn at all.

There are times, however, in the winter when there is clear weather, but then this most attractive port is closed by the ice, for, in spite of the Japan current, which corresponds to the Gulf stream in the Atlantic, the region around Unalaska is blocked with ice. There are, of course, openings in this ice, and vessels that make a business of arctic cruising might utilize them, but it can be readily appreciated that the fine passenger and freight steamers sailing from San Francisco are not going to run this risk.

Now let us compare with this region of ice and fog the earthly paradise which Hawaii will furnish us. Here there is never a fog, and perpetual summer makes ice a luxury of manufacture. Situated in the belt of the northeast trades, the climate is almost perfect, and navigation is rarely troubled with a storm. Honolulu itself is practically an American city planted in these isles of the Pacific, with all the modern features of civilized life, and already a port of call for several steamship lines. The industries of the island group have built up machine shops which are capable of making almost any of the repairs needed on steam vessels short of complete breakdown of the largest shafts. In other words, we have at Honolulu not only a splendid harbor, but all the other features which go to make up a desirable port of call, almost midway in the great ocean which separates our western shores from the Orient.

While a recollection of the geometry we studied in our school days teaches us that a great circle on a sphere is the shortest distance between any two points on its surface, experience in the Atlantic should teach us that this alone would not throw the steamer routes in a given direction, and it is a well-known fact to all who have crossed the Pacific that the course now followed by steamers, even when they do not touch at Honolulu, is by no means on the great circle course which goes near Unalaska. The people who run the merchant-steamers are very practical, and when they take a given course it is because it means a saving in money to the owners and in length of voyage to the passengers.

On the more southerly route the weather is uniformly fine, and the Pacific deserves its name; but on the route which would be taken if ships went by way of Unalaska there is not only the difficulty of fog and ice, but terrific storms and dangerous rocks and shoals, which are entirely absent from the more southerly route. It is very safe to say that the line of steamers which would undertake to make the voyage from San Francisco to Yokohama by way of Unalaska would very shortly surrender all its business to those who follow the more southerly route.

It thus seems to me very clear that the argument against the annexation of Hawaii on the ground that Unalaska would answer as an intermediate point of call instead of Honolulu is not only utterly untenable, but, in the light of all the facts of the case, simply ridiculous.

As a matter of fact, the great-circle track from San Francisco to Yokohama does not pass through Unalaska, but is 370 miles south of it. The distance between San Francisco and Yokohama on the great-circle route is something over 4,500 miles, but the majority of the tonnage engaged in trans-Pacific navigation passes back and forth along tracks varying in length from about 4,800 to 5,500 miles.

Hitherto, in considering the steamship routes between San Francisco and the Orient, Yokohama has always been the first port of call; but if we consider the possibility that the Philippines may become a part of our possessions, the route via Honolulu would be no farther from the great circle track than that via Unalaska, while, as has already been shown, the conditions are such as to make the northerly route not a matter for serious consideration.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, inasmuch as I do not expect to speak again, I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact, which I assert to be a fact, notwithstanding this statement of Commodore Melville, for whom I have great respect on account of his high character and ability—I want to state, and it can be demonstrated here, that there is a line of British steamers running on that route regularly and that they do run within sight of those islands.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the name of the line?

Mr. DINSMORE. It is a line of the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I can not yield any more time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just one moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can not answer questions. My time is limited and I must go on.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply desire to call the gentleman's attention to a question of fact in connection with this matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am dealing entirely with facts myself, and have a large stock of them on hand. Mr. Speaker, I have here a paper prepared by the Chief Intelligence Officer of the Navy Department, also a former member of the Hydrographic Office, which is along the same line, except very much stronger and more in detail, which statement I will put into my speech under the rule already laid down by the House.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF NAVAL INTELLIGENCE.

Washington, June 13, 1898.

SIR: Your letter of June 11, 1898, addressed to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, requesting data in regard to routes from San Francisco to Manila, has been referred to me.

I take pleasure in sending herewith the data requested. It is brief, but I think covers all the points which you wish. The only way for a steamer to go to Manila from San Francisco is by a hump or straight line, during ten months in the year, which would take them quite near to the Sandwich Islands. But the most important point is the statement of the Bureau of Steam Engineering that we have not a ship in the service, except the Minneapolis and Columbia, which could make the voyage from San Francisco to Manila without recaling on the way.

I have the honor to be, respectfully,

JOHN R. BARTLETT,

Captain, U. S. N., Chief Intelligence Officer, and former Hydrographer.

Hon. C. H. GROSVENOR,
House of Representatives.

Routes from San Francisco to Manila, prepared in Office of Naval Intelligence, by John R. Bartlett, Chief Intelligence Officer, Captain, United States Navy.

On the accompanying chart, which is a copy of the pilot chart of the North Pacific Ocean, published by the Hydrographic Office, No. 1401, are shown the various routes between San Francisco and Manila which may be discussed.

The route "B" is the great circle route, and is the shortest. Its length is 6,254 miles. This route is best adapted for the eastward voyage at nearly all times of the year, and possibly the westward voyage in the summer months.

The disadvantages of this route from San Francisco to Manila are, first, the adverse current, which, approximating 1 mile an hour, would add to the apparent length of this great-circle route for a vessel going at a speed of 10 knots, which is the economical speed for our men-of-war, an additional run of 500 miles. It must be remembered, too, that fogs prevail at all times of the year in the northern part of the Pacific Ocean, and this in itself is additional objection to the northern route. In fact, considering the adverse currents, bad weather, the wear and tear on the ships, steamers would generally take the hump-line course, which measures from San Francisco to Manila 6,500 miles.

The hump-line course (marked "C") from San Francisco to Yokohama, 4,791 miles, or the course marked "E," 6,500 miles from Manila, would, under the average probabilities of weather and the seasons, be the line pursued in preference to the great-circle route.

A further advantage of this route is that the location of the Hawaiian Islands would enable the vessels to divert the course so as to call in at Honolulu either for repairs, coal, or other stores as would be necessary. In fact, with the exception of the Columbia and Minneapolis, there are no data in steam engineering to show that any of our vessels can cross from San Francisco to Manila without recalling.

It is therefore good seamanship, in the proper prosecution and successful termination of a voyage, to stop at Honolulu for the necessary coal. The distance from San Francisco to Honolulu is 2,100 miles. The distance from Honolulu to Manila is 4,800 miles, shown on the chart as D D'.

A glance at the chart, too, will show that from San Francisco, either using the rhumb line or the great-circle route via Honolulu, a vessel bound to the Asiatic station will have favorable winds, favorable currents, and good weather.

To revert to the northern routes, the route shown on the Chart A is the shortest route from Puget Sound, and yet is only used by the northern companies for one or two months of the year, the danger of fog and bad weather having shown that a more southerly course is advisable for the ports of San Francisco, San Diego, and the prospective route via the Nicaragua Canal. It is unquestionable that a route to the Asiatic station via the Hawaiian Islands is indispensable.

Kiaki Island, one of the western islands of the Aleutian group, is a good anchorage in all weathers. It is, however, almost always surrounded by fog and is in the region of high winds and much bad weather. It is fully 300 miles north of the great-circle route between San Francisco and Manila or Hongkong.

DIFFERENT ROUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO TO MANILA.

Great circle route B, 6,254 miles. Advantage, shortest distance. Disadvantage, rough weather; variable winds; adverse currents of about 1 mile an hour; fogs.

Rhumb line E, usual route, 6,500 miles. Advantages, generally favorable weather; favorable winds; little current.

Southern route via Honolulu, DD, distance, 6,900 miles. Disadvantage, longest route. Advantages, good weather; fair winds; favorable current of nearly 1 mile an hour, with good harbor for recalling and refitting at about one-third the distance across. Furthermore, the numerous islands along this course, which are not inhabited, would give additional anchorages for coaling, if necessary.

It will be seen by an examination of the two arguments which I have produced that there is nothing available in the emergency of this hour growing out of the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE]. Now, I am not going to cover the whole ground of this case, and I am coming to another question, in connection with which I will also offer a few facts in reply to what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] stated, that organized labor in this country had become frightened at the probable overthrow of the free institutions of our Government by the Mongolian inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands.

I felt sorry for my friend from Missouri, as I believed then and I believe now that he sincerely feared that the institutions of our country are seriously threatened by the extending of the flag of the American Constitution and the American flag over 25,000 almond-eyed sons of the East. I for one do not believe that there is any danger. I have a higher opinion of the Christian civilization of my country, and I do not believe that the 75,000,000 people of the United States, with their intelligence, their education, their wonderful power of self-protection, are in any danger or that their liberties are in any danger by reason of the Portuguese, the Japanese, or the Chinese, and if my friend will devote himself to always securing the market of the United States, and indirectly the market of the world, against the incursions of the cheaper labor of Japan, by processes which his intelligence will at once commend to him, I will undertake to stand bail for him that during his lifetime this fabric of government will not be subverted by the Chinese from the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not have any idea that it will have any effect in my time or your time; but your children and my children have got to live here forever.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will tell my children to take care of themselves, as their forefathers did.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Give them a chance and they will.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to them, they need shed no tears over the prospects of their future. I will suggest that they are subject to the consolation of the old hymn, which I commend to my friend:

Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take;
Those clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and will break
With blessings on your head—in the extension of the territory and grandeur of your country, if it does not get around in due time for you. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman spoke of the opposition of organized labor to the passage of the bill. There has been published in a morning paper a declaration of a certain gentleman who says that he is opposed to the admission or the acquisition of these islands because he has some fears—born, in my judgment, of a lack of intelligence and of a lack of experience in the United States, and a lack of knowledge of its institutions; born of the fact that he was not born under them. I hold in my hand and will publish a letter from representatives of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, the Order of Railway Telegraphers, and a telegram just received from Montreal from Mr. Sargent, the head of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Locomotive Engineers, and also a letter from a distinguished gentleman representing the Order of Knights of Labor, and I will summarize what they state.

They state, first, that there never was any action by the organized labor of this country against the acquisition of these islands, and they state, in the next place, that so far as their knowledge goes they are all of them in favor of this acquisition. I can not conceive how it is possible that the workingmen, the laboring men of America, can be opposed to the opening up of the magnificent opportunities that seem to me to be presented by the acquisition of these islands.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 13, 1898.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of even date as to the feeling of "organized labor" on the question of the annexation of Hawaii, I beg leave to state that my individual opinion, based on thirty-three years' experience as a wage-earner and twenty years among organized men, constrains me to take issue with Mr. Gompers, who was quoted as opposed to annexation by Hon. CHAMP CLARK of Missouri, in his speech in the House of Representatives on Saturday last.

In this opinion Mr. Gompers should have been quoted as an individual and not as a representative of organized labor, and no man has authority to say that organized labor is for or against annexation, for the question has never been placed before organized labor.

Mr. Gompers himself, I am reliably informed, is a man of limited experience as a wage-earner, and does not correctly gauge the patriotic feeling among American workingmen, who desire to uphold in time of war the Administration, regardless of their own political opinions, and he seems to ignore their oft-expressed desire to "extend commerce and multiply the opportunities to labor." My belief is that Mr. Gompers, on this question, stands almost alone, as I am informed he did at the last convention of his own organization on the anti-Cuban war resolution.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

A. M. LAWSON,

Master Workman District Assembly 66, Washington, D. C.

Hon. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,
House of Representatives.

THE HOTEL RALEIGH, Washington, D. C., June 13, 1898.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your communication of the 11th instant concerning the position of organized labor on the annexation of Hawaii, permit me to state that I know of no labor organization, or any branch of it, which has taken any action on the matter. No doubt some members prominently identified with labor have expressed themselves on the subject one way or another as their individual opinions had led them, but the question has not received that consideration, to my knowledge, which the American workman does and should give to matters bearing on his interests.

Organized labor, in my opinion, should never be identified with partisan politics. We should at all times be free to strike an enemy or to assist a friend. In either case our memory should be good, irrespective of whatever his political party affiliations may be, for I hold that to advance the interests of organized labor is to advance the best interests of the state, and that is the first duty of every citizen worthy of the name. This is the school and the teaching which dominate the organizations which I have the honor to represent.

As to the annexation of Hawaii, which in no sense is a party issue, while it is true that we have not in any council or convention taken any position on the matter, it is also true that the sentiment of the great mass of the membership favor the proposition, as do many of their chief executive officers, as shown by the inclosed telegrams. This expression has become more pronounced as the apparent necessity grows since the brilliant victory of Manila. Such feelings are inspired by the same motives which prompted so many of our members to enter the volunteer service.

It is not at all probable that in the event of annexation the condition of labor in Hawaii would or could be transplanted to this country, no more than the quasi serfdom of Mexico would find lodgment under our Constitution, but, on the contrary, I submit there is every reason to believe that the advanced intelligence, conservatism, and patriotism of the organized American workman would meet such conditions and vastly improve them. There are so many illustrations that it would be idle to enumerate them.

Yours, truly,

W. F. HYNES,

Representing Brotherhood Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood Locomotive Firemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, Order of Railway Telegraphers.

Hon. C. H. GROSVENOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MONTREAL, QUEBEC, June 11, 1898.

W. F. HYNES, Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

As an American citizen, I am heartily in favor of the annexation of Hawaii.
F. P. SARGENT,
Chief of Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen.

PEORIA, ILL., June 11, 1898.

W. F. HYNES (care of C. Grosvenor):

Answering your telegram, in my opinion the United States should annex the Hawaiian Islands. The necessity of our control over the islands in time of war is now apparent to everyone. Commercially, too, they are of great importance to us.

P. H. MORRISSEY,
Grand Master Brotherhood Railroad Trainmen.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, June 11, 1898.

W. F. HYNES, The Raleigh, Washington, D. C.:

In the position which it seems the United States must hereafter occupy, I deem Hawaii a very valuable, if not indispensable, acquisition.

E. E. CLARK,
Chief Order of Railway Conductors.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to save time, reserve time for the benefit of other gentlemen who desire to speak, and I propose to adopt as part of my own report made to the Republican Club of the city of New York upon the very interesting question of territorial evolution, made on the 16th day of May, less than a month ago. It points out the advantages and consoles my friends on this floor who are anxious about the subject of the subjugation of our laborers by the acquisition of territory.

"Territorial Evolution"—A report presented to the Republican Club of the City of New York, by C. H. Denison, chairman of committee on national affairs, May 16, 1898.

The events through which this nation has been passing during the last three years, and their climax in the crisis now upon us, serve to throw into clearer light and impress more deeply on public attention the theme of this paper.

The universal interest in the subject, its great importance and the attitude of the Government, standing in such violent contrast to that which has been steadily maintained for a hundred years are considerations which demand careful study and a decision in accordance with the changed condition of the world.

Hitherto the discussions of the subject have been restricted to specific instances of acquisition, never broadening into a consideration of the subject as a general proposition, nor attempting to lay out a definite programme showing the extent and limitations within which the boundaries of the Republic may legitimately aspire.

A careful review of the arguments that have been put forth relative to acquisitions past and pending suggests that their general substance and tenor logically point to such a plan as is expressed in the following propositions:

First. The pacific character of the Government must ever be maintained, and therefore there shall be no acquisitions by aggressive war for the purpose of conquest.

Second. No continental territory shall be acquired beyond the boundaries of North America.

Third. No considerable population shall be brought into the Republic till they have proved their capacity for self-government.

Fourth. Subject to the above rules, it should be the settled policy and constant aim of American statesmanship to extend the boundaries of the Republic to include the whole of the continent of North America, the Hawaiian Islands on the west, and on the east of us all the islands located in such proximity to our coast as to be conveniently used against us as bases of hostile operations by any nation with which we may be at war; and beyond these limits, such stations for coaling and repair as may prove necessary for the maintenance and protection of a world-wide commerce. In presenting the arguments in support of these propositions the question as to the constitutionality of territorial acquisition is, in the matter of its importance, the first point to claim consideration.

The familiar clause of the Constitution which prohibits to the General Government all powers not expressly delegated to it by that instrument and the silence of the Constitution on the subject of territorial expansion became a serious stumbling block to President Jefferson on the first scheme of national aggrandizement in the acquisition of the territory of Louisiana.

Belonging to the school of strict constructionists, he believed that any acquisition of territory would be a violation of the fundamental law, and he would gladly have cleared the way for that purchase by a further amendment of the Constitution. But the opportunity was in hand and could not wait on the slow process of amendment. The purchase must be made at once or the great opportunity would be lost, and in all probability forever.

So high an estimate did he place on the importance to the Republic of securing the possession of this territory and thereby the control of that great highway of internal commerce, the Mississippi River, that he did not hesitate to violate the Constitution as he understood it, purposing to procure a subsequent ratification of the act in a constitutional amendment that should make specific provisions for future acquisitions. But the strict constructionists were fortunately in the minority. The wise opinion prevailed that the power to acquire territory was inherent in the very nature of government. The project of amending the Constitution was abandoned, and the troublesome question was deemed to be settled in favor of the constitutionality of territorial acquisition for all time.

The precedent set in that case has been followed by all departments of the Government till the present time. "The instances in which the Executive has interpreted the Constitution in favor of annexation," says Mr. Loren B. Thurston, "are eleven in number: By the negotiation of treaties for the annexation of Louisiana in 1803; Florida in 1819; California, New Mexico, and Arizona, in 1848; the so-called Gadsden purchase of the southern portion of New Mexico and Arizona in 1853; and Alaska in 1867, all of which were ratified by the Senate. Treaties were also negotiated by the Executive for the annexation of Texas in 1837 and 1843; Hawaii in 1854; Santo Domingo in 1870; Hawaii in 1893 and again in 1897, which last treaty is now pending before the Senate."

Three times, in different ways, has Congress recognized the doctrine, and four times has it been favorably adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the first of these cases, The American Insurance Company vs. Canter, Chief Justice Marshall, in rendering the opinion of the court, said: "The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the power of making wars and making treaties; consequently the Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or treaty."

In the case of The Mormon Church vs. The United States (130 U. S. R.) the court says: "The power to acquire territory is derived from the treaty-making power and the power to declare and carry on war. * * * The incidents of these powers are those of national sovereignty and belong to all independent governments."

Beyond these recorded authorities we venture the assertion that the acquisition of territory is clearly covered by the clause of the Constitution which enjoins on Congress the duty of providing for the national defense. To acquire territory that is necessary for defensive purposes is as clearly within this provision as the purchase of ships and other war material of foreign construction.

The limitation of Federal powers to those expressly conferred by the Constitution may properly be considered as referring only to matters of controversy arising between the General Government and any of the States, involving questions in which the interests of the two are at variance.

This provision was the outgrowth of that jealousy of vested local rights and dread of their surrender that pervaded all the debates on the Constitution and which long survived its adoption in the arrogant assumptions and obnoxious displays of the doctrine of State sovereignty. Under this view the restrictive clause of the Constitution must be interpreted as not being in any wise inimical to the extension of the national domain for purposes of defense, since in such cases the interests of the States and the General Government are identical.

In the absence, then, of any specific provisions in the Constitution relating to the question of territorial expansion, the practice of the Government becomes supplementary to the Constitution, as inviolable as the Constitution itself; and since this power has been exercised repeatedly from the purchase of Louisiana in 1803 to the Hawaiian treaty in 1897, it should be agreed that the constitutionality of acquisitions is fully established and closed, and that any further revival of it is as impertinent and unpatriotic as the attempt to reopen the issues that were forever settled at Yorktown in 1781 and at Appomattox in 1865.

The only question, then, for consideration in relation to any project of territorial acquisition is the question of expediency.

Regarding future acquisitions of continental domain it may be confidently asserted that whenever our neighbor of British America, either with, or possibly without, the assent of the mother country, shall make voluntary application to unite her destinies with the Republic, her admission to the Union would be hailed with enthusiasm by the American people. The objections that have been raised against every other extension of territory would be futile against a population in all respects so homogeneous and congenial as the people of Canada.

What may not inappropriately be called the case of operations in the field of polemics on this subject, the vital point around which the arguments pertinent and impertinent during three-quarters of a century, and especially for the last five years, have been centering, is the case of Hawaii. No other point within the boundaries above suggested as the proper and final limits of territorial growth can furnish in such ample measure all the elements for testing the arguments for and against annexation as Hawaii. It is not only not contiguous, it is insular and separated from our western boundary by 2,000 miles of sea.

It is objected that its productions compete injuriously with some local interests of our citizens; that its population is alien, heterogeneous, and not in a condition to sympathize with our manners and customs and yield a cheerful support to our laws and institutions; that it would excite the jealousy and provoke the hostility of other nations; that it would add a new expense to the burden of government in the armaments required to defend it. In short, it contains all the grounds possible in any supposable case of acquisition to excite the fears and rouse the opposition of the enemies of further acquisition, and therefore if, after all has been said that can be said against this particular acquisition, the verdict is still clearly in its favor, then the question of expediency must be considered as effectually settled as the question of constitutionality, and every other territory within the ultimate limits suggested must drift to us as the legitimate and undisputed dower of the peaceful processes of evolution.

A glance at the literature contributed to the subject since the launching of the Republic of Hawaii on January 10, 1893, shows that the enemies of all further expansion have not only been aroused, but have been diligent, and reveal the weakness of their cause in the absurdities marshaled to maintain it.

The late George Ticknor Curtis opens an argument in the North American Review for March, 1893, with the following carefully stated proposition:

"In answering the question, 'Can Hawaii be constitutionally annexed to the United States?' I shall maintain the following proposition: That a foreign country can not be incorporated into the American Union unless two things concur—first, that the foreign country is contiguous to territory of the United States; second, that in the judgment of the people of the United States, as represented by their Government, there is a controlling public necessity for the acquisition."

Then he cites the three acquisitions of Louisiana, Texas, and Alaska, and proceeds:

"These three precedents establish the proposition which I laid down at the beginning of this article. They put a construction on the Constitution which can not be lightly set aside. If I am asked why there should not be a new precedent made which will extend the scope of acquiring foreign territory by treaty so as to make it include the acquisition of a foreign country not contiguous to the United States, my answer would be twofold: First, that the Constitution has received such an interpretation for a long period of time as would be entirely inconsistent with the making of any new precedent; secondly, that if we acquire Hawaii by a construction of the Constitution which is contrary to the long-settled one, there will be no limit to future acquisitions of the same kind."

Without further comment on his views of the "controlling necessity" for the acquisitions in each case than to characterize them as being far from convincing, it is sufficient to notice his justification of the acquisition of Alaska on the ground of contiguity, when if he had taken the pains to glance at the map he would have learned that the southernmost extremity of the dipper handle of that Territory is more than 500 miles from our border, and that a thousand miles is not adequate to measure the distance from our line to the nearest corner of the main body of the Alaskan Territory, and also that this acquisition brought to us the Aleutian Islands, stretching nearly to the western shore of Bering Sea.

So here we have the strange spectacle of a distinguished opponent of territorial growth protesting against establishing a new precedent for the acquisition of noncontiguous domain, and in the same breath approving an acquisition already accomplished which established a precedent for acquisitions both noncontiguous and insular.

At about the same date of the above article there appeared in a conspicuous periodical the amazing declaration that if any other nation should seize Hawaii and fortify it, we could take it from her in the event of our ever wanting it as easily as we could defend it against assault.

The claim that the pen is mightier than the sword reaches the climax of assumption when with a single sentence it annihilates the entire science of strategy and fortification with its Maltes and Gibralters.

And then, Professor Sumner, of the chair of social and political science in Yale University, in an article on the "Fallacy of territorial extension," in the Forum for June, 1896, ventures to say concerning the disputed Alaskan boundary: "If an American can go over to the English side and mine gold there for his profit, under English laws and jurisdiction, and an Englishman can come over to the American side and mine gold there for his profit under American laws and jurisdiction, what difference does it make where the line falls? The only case in which it would make any difference is where the laws and institutions of the two States were not on equal stages of enlightenment." If this be true, then boundary lines between all contiguous states existing on equal planes of enlightenment are matters of no consequence.

He says again, "If we had never taken Texas and northern Mexico, we should never have had secession," a statement absolutely incapable of proof and which could be true only on the condition of the continuation of the institution of slavery. But that slavery was doomed has been already proved in fulfillment of the famous prophecy that this nation could not endure half slave and half free.

Again, he says: "The sum of the matter is that colonization and territorial extension are burdens, not gains. Great civilized states can not avoid these burdens. They are the penalties of greatness because they are the duties of it." Then, indeed, according to Professor Sumner, the United States is not a great civilized state, and the only escape from such burdens is to take refuge in national insignificance.

Once more he says, "And extension will not make us more secure where we are, but will force us to take new measures to secure our new acquisitions," in which view he will have the cordial sympathy of the gentleman who recently declared from his seat in the United States Senate, that it is impolitic for a nation to have any possessions which it may ever be called on to defend.

In gratifying contrast against these ill-reasoned and inconclusive essays stands a long array of opinions from men whose learning, experience, and public service are a guaranty of sincerity of sentiment and soundness of reasoning.

As early as 1826 President John Quincy Adams said "that the preservation of the Hawaiian Islands from the domination or control of any other great nation is essential to the welfare of the United States." From that day to the present the doctrine thus boldly proclaimed has been the settled policy of this Government, without break or interruption, save only by the Administration of Grover Cleveland.

With this single exception, every President, from Adams to McKinley, by tacit assent or positive declaration has been an advocate of this policy.

In 1842 President Tyler said that "any attempt by another power to take possession of the islands, colonize them, and subvert the native Government could not but create dissatisfaction on the part of the United States." Positive action to the same effect was taken by Presidents Fillmore, Pierce, Buchanan, Johnson, Grant, Arthur, Harrison, and McKinley.

The annual message of Andrew Johnson to the Fortieth Congress, December, 1868, contains the following significant sentence relative to Hawaii: "A reciprocity treaty, while it could not materially diminish the revenues of the United States, would be a guaranty of the good will and forbearance of all nations until the people of the islands shall of themselves at no distant day voluntarily apply for admission into the Union."

President Harrison said: "It is essential that none of the great powers shall secure these islands. Such a possession would not consist with our safety and with the peace of the world."

President McKinley, after a careful review of the successive changes in the condition of the islands that have led up to the present relations they bear to the Union, says: "Under such circumstances, annexation is not a change; it is a consummation."

Within the past eighty-five years Hawaii has been taken possession of once by England, once by Russia, and twice by France. In 1851 the American consul, E. H. Allen, went to Washington at the request of the Hawaiian Government to appeal for the interposition of this Government against the threatening attitude of France. Secretary of State Daniel Webster said to him: "I trust the French will not take possession; but if they do, they will be dislodged if my advice is taken, if the whole power of the Government is required to do it." This bold attitude was maintained by the most positive and threatening admonitions communicated directly to the French Government by Mr. Webster, and it was alone by reason of these warnings that France relinquished her designs.

In 1854 Secretary of State Marcy, in a communication to David S. Gregg, minister to Honolulu, said: "With this dispatch you will be furnished with full power to treat with the present authorities of the Hawaiian Government for the transfer of the Sandwich Islands to the United States." With equal force and directness has this policy been supported by Secretaries Seward in 1867, Fish in 1873, Blaine in 1881, Bayard in 1886, Foster in 1893, and Sherman in 1897. Mr. Blaine insisted that whenever the maintenance of a benevolent neutrality for Hawaii should prove impracticable, "this Government would then unhesitatingly meet the altered situation by seeking an avowedly American solution for the grave issues presented."

Mr. Bayard, in commenting on the Fish treaty of the Grant Administration, said: "It was simply a matter of waiting until the apple should ripen and fall. Unfortunately, nothing was done by Congress in pursuance of this easy, legitimate, and perfectly feasible process of acquisition."

United States ministers and agents to Hawaii have been unanimous in supporting this policy with the single exception of the paramount commissioner of the Cleveland Administration.

The criticism that these opinions are discredited by the fact that they are the opinions of civilians, yet based on considerations of strategy, can not avail, since they are vehemently sustained by the most distinguished living experts in naval and military science, among whom are General Schofield, General Alexander, Captain Wiltse, Captain Mahan, Admiral Belknap, and Admiral Brown. Captain Mahan, who is acknowledged in all countries as the highest authority on such matters, says:

"Too much stress can not be laid upon the immense disadvantage to us of any maritime enemy having a coaling station within 2,500 miles, as this is, of every point of our coast from Puget Sound to Mexico. Were there many others available, we might find it difficult to exclude from all. There is, however, but one. Shut out from the Sandwich Islands as a coal base, an enemy is thrown back for supplies of fuel to a distance of 3,500 to 4,000 miles, or between 7,000 and 8,000 going and coming, an impediment to sustained maritime operations well-nigh prohibitive. It is rarely that so important a factor in the attack or defense of a coast line, of a sea frontier, is concentrated in a single position, and the circumstance renders doubly imperative upon us to secure it if we rightfully can."

And finally, General Schofield says: "The Hawaiian people must have protection from some quarter. If they can not get it from the United States they will have to reach out for it in some other direction. To fail those people now would be a crime."

It should seem that this array of opinions from statesmen and strategists would be sufficient to silence the objections of those who have given no time to the study of the subject, yet we desire to submit a few plain facts that must be readily understood by all.

The conclusion is as evident as anything that can be deduced from human experience that hostilities are far more likely to arise between contiguous nations than between nations widely separated from each other. The ancient quiet of eastern Asia has been broken by the introduction of European rivalries and jealousies, and aggravated by the marvelous development and growing ambition of Japan. Students of the future have already predicted that the close of the twentieth century will witness on the Pacific Ocean the greatest commerce the world has ever known. Present conditions indicate that at its eastern terminus the bulk of this commerce will belong to the United States, while at its western terminus it will meet the eager competition of England, France, Germany, Russia, China, and Japan. This commerce would be at the mercy of a war fleet operating from Pearl Harbor.

Hawaii in the possession of either of the oriental nations, by reason of the great military advantage it would give to it over its neighbors, would be a constant source of irritation, a provocative of strife. In the possession of the United States its mission would be pacific, except in the event of war between the Republic and any of those nations. But, as has already been shown, the probability of war between those nations is so much greater than of war between any of their number and the United States that the conclusion must follow that it would be much more to their interest, and no doubt to their desire also, that the islands should be held by the Republic rather than by any of their number. This arrangement would be the surest means of preserving the balance of power and would give the United States a controlling influence as an arbiter for peace and that through an agency of incalculable value for the protection of its own interests.

The fear that Hawaiian sugar would compete ruinously with the beet-sugar industry has been dissipated by simply referring to the distance from markets of Hawaiian sugar and the greater time required to mature a crop of Hawaiian than of beet sugar.

Nor is the case of Hawaii obnoxious to the third rule above laid down. Even if the native population were in all respects as undesirable as it has been represented, its numbers are too inconceivable to justify the rejection of so important an adjunct to the national defenses as Hawaii has been shown to be.

The decline of the native population from half a million to 30,000 in the last century indicates its early extinction, and as its present number would be but one-tenth of 1 per cent, or one in each thousand of the population of the Republic, all apprehensions on this account are evidently groundless. But the objection is still further discredited by the fact that the native Hawaiians are peaceably disposed and easily governed, that they are favorable to annexation, and that a successful experiment of five years has proved the capacity of the inhabitants to govern themselves if unmolested by foreign influence, a danger that would be effectually prevented by incorporation into the Union, either under a State or Territorial government.

Hawaii is called "the cross roads of the Pacific," "the key of the Pacific," "the Gibraltar of the Pacific." Hawaii is Americanized already. It is the only place on the globe where the Stars and Stripes float over more ships than all other flags combined. Hawaii was rescued from barbarism by American energy, American piety, and American capital. Ninety per cent of Hawaiian wealth belongs to Americans. The Hawaiian Government is built on the American model. And now the Hawaiian Government offers us its assistance in our conflict with Spain, and even if the material advantages of annexation were not so completely in our favor as they clearly are, the nation whose sword banished slavery from this continent and now draws it to expel the lingering remnant of medieval barbarism in a crusade for humanity would be untrue to both its record and its mission should it refuse to take Hawaii under its protecting care.

The question "Am I my brother's keeper?" is a murderer's question, whether it is asked by a Cain or a nation; and the American people will not cheerfully submit to a policy whose chief distinction is miserly greed or cowardly shrinking from responsibility.

Every consideration of sound policy, wise statesmanship, and that enlightened philanthropy which rejoices in extending the blessings of free government call for a prompt ratification of the long-pending treaty of annexation.

Since a full statement of the case in its application to the Atlantic islands would be largely a repetition of the foregoing, a few suggestions on this point will be sufficient. It requires no argument to prove that the defensive condition of the United States would be greatly improved by the transfer of the whole of these islands to our possession. Such a change would remove to the other side of the Atlantic the strong military bases of several European nations and cancel the great advantage these holdings give to them in the event of a war with this country.

This point is powerfully illustrated by the difficulties under which we labor in supporting Commodore Dewey at Manila, and emphasizes the importance to us of the possession of Hawaii, which would reduce by 2,000 miles the distance from his base. The transfer to this Government of the Spanish West Indies would diminish to other trans-Atlantic nations the value of their holdings in those waters in the same ratio that it would enhance to us the strategic value of the new acquisitions.

The remark frequently heard, "We don't want Cuba," is not an evidence of careful reflection on this subject; rather the contrary.

When Cuba shall have proved her capacity for self-government, as Hawaii has done, and like Hawaii shall offer to come into the Union, it would be the extreme of un wisdom to refuse her admission, and circumstances might arise which would render her admission advisable even before she had reached the highest degree of self-governing intelligence, as, for example, if the alternative lay between accepting her or going to war to prevent her uniting with some Old-World power. The present war shows how great was the blunder our statesmen made twenty years ago in refusing to accept the Danish West Indies on the terms offered, and it has demonstrated the great importance of the trans-Isthmian canal.

Our experience with the Oregon enables us to calculate to a nicety the enormous expense and extreme risk of transferring a fleet or a squadron from one coast of the Republic to the other. It is by no means irrational to speculate on the great good fortune this war may be to our country. It has compelled our laissez faire statesmanship, in a controversy with a moribund power, to put the nation in a condition of defense. No one can tell how soon we may be forced into war with a nation of real power. In that event we should need the most rapid transit possible, over the shortest possible routes.

So commanding is the position of Cuba with relation to the Nicaragua Canal that it would be far better for us in the event of such a war that Cuba should be ours than alien, better certainly than hostile; and it will be indeed fortunate for us if in such event Cuba shall bear the same relation to us that Hawaii does now. The first breach made in the foreign ties that have held these islands from us will stimulate the tendency toward other changes in the same direction till the wish of President Grant shall be realized in the withdrawal of all European nations from the Western Continent.

The length of time it would require to realize this hope and for the slow processes of assimilation to bring to a proper condition for annexation the population of some portions of these anticipated possessions is not sufficient ground for despairing of their ultimate accomplishment. We have but to wait on time, and time is never weary. It took Rome six hundred years to die, and as it has been fondly believed that the American Republic was building for eternity, and as no enterprise known to man can be so gratifying and ennobling as the work of building states, a thousand years could be cheerfully spent in settling the boundaries and perfecting the organization of a Republic that shall stand invincible against any foe, the leader and bulwark of the civilization of the globe.

C. H. DENISON, Chairman.
WILLIAM GREENWOOD, Secretary.

And further, Mr. Speaker, I had been at great pains, with a great deal of very valuable help, to try to answer, in a modest way, the very able argument made against this proposition by the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] on the 29th day of February. I had prepared this speech as rapidly as I could, and, with more help from others than I devoted to it myself, I have taken up the able suggestions of that gentleman to the number of about sixty-five paragraphs, and have tried in a very concise sort of primer-like way to answer each one of his suggestions. I can not go into it now; but for the purpose of fairness in the argument I promise the gentleman, and I promise the House, that it shall appear in the RECORD tomorrow morning. That is the best I can do without consuming more time than I am willing to be charged with at this time. And in that connection—

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I should like to say to the gentleman that it is barely possible that I may desire to respond, but I do not know whether it is intended to give me time or not. I do not know whether I can get time to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the best I can do is to put it in the RECORD, which I will do.

Brief of points made by Hon. H. U. Johnson against annexation of Hawaii, February 23, 1898 (volume 51, No. 63, page 2315, Congressional Record), and of reply thereto.

Johnson's point 1.—(The substance and not the exact language is given.) The Hawaiian nation has everything to gain and nothing to lose by annexation. Annexation "should be discussed, considered, and decided solely from the standpoint of American interest, and with the single purpose of promoting the happiness and welfare of those who dwell under the shadow of the American flag." (Paragraph 5 of Johnson's speech.)

Reply.—This is inconsistent with paragraphs 10, 11, and 12. He first admits that annexation will be beneficial to Hawaii. He then says it should be considered solely from the American standpoint, and then purposes to go behind the record and oppose annexation on the grounds:

- (1, Par. 9.) That the Hawaiian people are opposed to it.
- (2, Par. 11.) That the Hawaiian Government is misrepresenting the Hawaiian people.
- (3, Par. 12.) That a petition from Hawaiians has been filed against it.
- (4, Par. 12.) That supporters of annexation do not submit the proposition to popular vote.

This country and the world has recognized the Republic of Hawaii as a de facto and de jure government.

It has maintained itself for five years, since January 17, 1893.

It has lawfully and peaceably adopted a constitution directing its executive to negotiate a treaty of annexation with the United States. (Art. 22, constitution Republic of Hawaii.)

It has not withheld the franchise from any citizen, native or foreign born, the sole change made by the Republic in the qualification of voters being that the oath of allegiance shall be to the Republic instead of the monarchy.

Under this constitution a Senate and House of Representatives was elected in 1894, both of which, at both the special session of 1894 and the regular session of 1896, passed unanimous resolutions in favor of annexation.

All elections in Hawaii are under the Australian ballot system and are absolutely secret.

No charge has been made by even the Royalists that the elections are not fairly conducted and a free expression of the wishes of voters. A majority of those who have taken the oath of allegiance to the Republic of Hawaii, and who are now voters, are native Hawaiians. A majority of the members of the first House of Representatives, including the speaker, were full-blooded native Hawaiians.

The second general election under the Republic in September, 1897, resulted in the return of a Legislature again unanimously pledged to annexation.

The Hawaiian Government has negotiated a treaty of annexation in accordance with the terms of the constitution, in accordance with the verdict of two general elections, in accordance with the unanimous vote of both houses of the Legislature at two sessions of the same, and the treaty has been ratified by the Hawaiian Senate.

Johnson's point 2.—The masses of Americans are indifferent. "The very few of our countrymen who have given any attention to the subject are inclined to favor annexation." "The superficial and unreflecting" are appealed to by national vanity and find the project hard to resist. (Paragraph 6.)

The proper method of disabusing the public is to break down the doors of the Senate and let the people see "the danger that lurks in the proposition." (Paragraph 7.)

Reply.—He admits that those who have studied the subject favor annexation.

The following is a list of a few of the "superficial and unreflecting" who have favored annexation, in addition to a majority of the present Senate, who are admitted by JOHNSON to support it:

Gen. J. M. Schofield, Gen. B. S. Alexander, Admiral Dupont, Admiral George Brown, Admiral Belknap, Captain Mahan, Admiral Porter, ex-Senator Dolph, of Oregon; ex-Senator Ingalls, of Kansas; ex-Senator Butler, of South Carolina; Dean Wayland, of Yale Law School; ex-Secretary of the Navy Benjamin F. Tracy, Civil Service Commissioner Procter, ex-Governor Stone, of Missouri; ex-Governor Johnson, of Missouri; ex-Secretary of the Interior Noble.

Johnson's point 3.—Two-thirds of the native Hawaiians have signed a petition protesting against annexation. (Par. 12.)

Reply.—Four thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight, or 23 per cent, of the signers of the petition are minors.

The petition states that the minors are between the ages of 14 and 20. It shows upon its face that there are 677 of the petitioners under 14 years of age, of whom no less than 13 are only 2 years of age.

The ages of 278 of the minors under 14 years of age have been fraudulently raised to over 14 years of age in order to try and make it appear that they are of more responsible age, and to conform to the certificate in the petition that they are over 14 years of age.

The petition shows on its face that the signatures of over 1,400 of the adult signers are not original, but are forgeries.

In one case a whole page of the male signatures and one page of the female signatures are all in one handwriting.

In one case 126 signatures and in another 178 are all in the same handwriting.

The ages of the petitioners are unreliable, many of them being filled in at a different time from the signatures and giving round numbers instead of exact figures.

Each and every page containing the fraudulent insertions, as above stated, is certified to as being genuine by the officers getting the petition up, showing entire lack of good faith on their part.

(See the report of L. A. Thurston on the Hawaiian anti-annexation petition herewith.)

Johnson's point 4.—The supporters of annexation are unwilling to submit the question of annexation to the ballot of the people of Hawaii. (Par. 12.)

Reply.—In the first place, why should the question of annexation be submitted to popular vote in Hawaii any more than in the United States? The people of the United States assume obligations and responsibilities by virtue of annexation as well as do the people of Hawaii. Why should not the question, therefore, be submitted to a popular vote in the United States?

The reply to this is that the Constitution of the United States does not provide that annexations of territory shall be submitted to popular vote. Neither does the constitution of Hawaii.

The Constitution and precedents have established the proposition that the legal method of acquiring territory is by treaty, which shall be ratified by the Senate; or by joint resolution or bill, approved by a majority of both Houses.

For United States Supreme Court decisions affirming the constitutional power of annexation, see Thurston's Handbook on Annexation, page 24.

UNITED STATES PRECEDENTS.

In none of the annexations which have been made by the United States, with the exception of Texas, has either a direct or indirect popular vote been taken in the United States or in the country annexed. In the case of Texas, an indirect vote was taken by the adoption of a State constitution by the people of Texas after the Texas Legislature had ratified the joint resolution passed by the Congress of the United States.

HAWAIIAN AUTHORITY FOR ANNEXATION.

The constitution of the Republic of Hawaii, under which two Legislatures have been elected, contains a specific clause authorizing and directing the president to negotiate a treaty of annexation with the United States, subject to the ratification of the Hawaiian Senate. (Art. 22, Constn. Rep. Hawaii.)

It is claimed that this is a new authority which has been usurped by a revolutionary government, and that the Government has not the power to negotiate such a treaty except upon popular vote.

The reply to this is that from ancient times the power to negotiate all treaties, annexation or otherwise, has been exclusively in the executive of Hawaii, as is evidenced by precedents in the past.

In 1851, in view of aggressions then being committed by the French, Kamehameha III, without even consulting the Legislature, executed a provisional cession of Hawaii to the United States.

In 1852 the Hawaiian Legislature passed a specific act authorizing the King to negotiate at any time a treaty of annexation.

This act has never been repealed and still remains a part of the law of Hawaii.

In 1854 King Kamehameha III negotiated a formal treaty of annexation with the United States, with provision for popular vote.

Not only has the present treaty been negotiated in accordance with the general powers of the Executive of Hawaii, the statute of 1852 above referred to, and the specific authority of the constitution of the Republic, but the Legislature of Hawaii in both Houses has voluntarily at two successive sessions unanimously passed resolutions ratifying and approving of the annexation proposition, and a new Legislature has just been elected which is committed to annexation.

For the United States to now refuse to annex Hawaii unless a popular vote were first taken, would be to take, not only an entirely new position for which there is no precedent, but to go behind the Hawaiian records and require something to be done which neither the laws of the United States nor Hawaii have ever required to be done in the past and do not require to be done now.

Again, the proposition is not that the vote should be submitted to the lawful voters of Hawaii, but to "all the people of Hawaii."

In the first place, nearly one-half of the people of Hawaii are Chinese and Japanese, who have no right to vote now, and never had the right to vote there, and who by the constitution of Hawaii are not eligible to exercise the franchise.

If it is claimed that what is meant by the "people of Hawaii" are those who could vote under the Monarchy, the reply is that, under the constitution of the Republic of Hawaii, all who were voters under the Monarchy can become voters under the Republic by simply taking the oath of allegiance to the Republic, and no one is eligible to become a voter under the Republic unless he takes such an oath.

All those who are not now voters are therefore nonvoters, simply by reason of their unwillingness to accept the Republic and their adherence to the cause of monarchy.

To submit the question of what the future of the Republic shall be to those whose main object in life is to overthrow the Republic and restore the monarchy would not only be stultification of the Republic, but in violation of the constitution of Hawaii, and a placing of the power in the hands of the monarchists to exercise control over the future of the Republic to whose existence they are inimical.

There is no law of reason or ethics which requires, or should require, that a government should submit its destinies to the votes of those who seek its destruction. There is no more reason why Hawaii should be compelled to submit its future and its existence to the vote of the anti-republican monarchists than there would have been to the proposition, after Yorktown, to allow the Tories to take part in the vote as to whether or not the country should be resubmitted to the jurisdiction of King George.

A parallel proposition would have been, after Appomattox, to submit to popular vote the question of whether or not the Union should be restored.

Johnson's point 5.—The monarchy was overthrown by American citizens. Although he argued the other way before, "color is given to the accusation by the pertinacity and determination with which this treaty is now being pressed." (Paragraph 13.)

Reply.—For reply to the charge that the monarchy was overthrown by United States officials, see Thurston's Handbook, page 38, reply to eighteenth objection.

Mr. JOHNSON says that the "pertinacity and determination with which the annexation treaty is now being pressed gives color to the charge that Americans overthrew the monarchy."

There is no more pertinacity and determination being displayed now than there was in 1893 and 1894, when Mr. JOHNSON very ably refuted this charge. (See Morgan Report, volume 1, page 7; Senate Report No. 227, Fifty-third Congress, second session.)

Johnson's point 6.—The people of Hawaii are not sufficiently intelligent to be incorporated into our domain.

Intelligence is the exception there; ignorance is the general rule. (Par. 18.)

Even if Americans "pour into and take possession of the islands, the ignorance will remain."

Reply.—The last Hawaiian census, taken in September, 1896, gives the percentage of those able to read and write, as follows:

(The age from which illiteracy is reckoned in Hawaii is 6 years instead of 10 years, as it is in this country. If 10 years were made the basis, as in this country, the percentage of those able to read and write would be much higher.)

Hawaiians, pure blooded, per cent able to read and write, 83.97; part Hawaiians, mixed blood, per cent able to read and write, 91.21; the two making an average of 85.28 per cent.

The statistics show that 28 per cent of the pure-blooded and 69 per cent of the part Hawaiians are able to read and write in English.

The statistics also show that of the 14,000 children between 6 and 15 years of age, 81 per cent are attending school, in addition to which there are several thousand under 6 years of age attending kindergarten schools, and over 2,000 who are over 15 years of age attending school.

Free public schools, all taught in English, are maintained throughout the country at Government expense, while there is a compulsory education law under which all children are obliged to attend school between the years of 6 and 15.

The Census, page 100, says:

"The system of enforcing the law for bringing children into school is peculiarly efficient in these islands. Very few children escape being obliged to attend school. . . . There are very few countries, however, where education is so universal. . . . Those who are illiterate come to us from abroad."

With regard to the Portuguese and their alleged undesirability, the charge is without foundation. Like the poor peasant population of other countries which comes to the United States, the majority of them are unable to read or write, the percentage in Hawaii who are able to read and write being 28. But they are industrious, economical, and moral, constituting to-day the best laboring population of Hawaii.

The criminal statistics show that the percentage of offenses committed by Portuguese is less than that of any other nationality in Hawaii.

As is the case in this country, the second generation, the children of the original immigrants, having all received public-school education, all speak, read, and write in English, are a progressive, valuable element, making good citizens, mixing with and becoming part of the general community.

As to the Chinese, there is no fear from those now there in case annexation takes place.

Neither the Chinese nor Japanese are eligible to citizenship in Hawaii. They are aliens there as in the United States, and annexation will not change that status.

They have no control in the Government now and they will not after annexation. As to their numbers, if the source of supply is shut off by prohibiting immigration, the number in Hawaii will diminish. For example, a laxly enforced Chinese exclusion act was enacted in Hawaii in 1888, at which time there were approximately 21,000 in the country. In 1891, only five years after the enactment, the number of Chinese in the country had become reduced to less than 15,000.

The Japanese also, to a somewhat less degree than the Chinese, will return to their own country.

Examples of the return of Japanese to Japan after arrival in Hawaii are shown by the immigration statistics of Hawaii.

For instance, 676 men arrived from Japan February 8, 1895.

On March 31, 1890, practically five years thereafter, 425 of them had returned to Japan.

This was the first lot of immigrants; since then the percentage of returns has not been so great.

A fair general estimate may be made that within five years after any given lot of Japanese arrive in Hawaii, one-third of them will have returned to Japan, and thereafter not less than 10 to 15 per cent will return each year.

Johnson's point 7.—The supporters of annexation say that annexation does not necessarily imply that it is to become a State.

"For this very reason I antagonize it with all the more resolution." No territory should be annexed unless "in due course of events it will become entitled to membership in the Federal Union." (Paragraph 21.)

Reply.—There is no reason, precedent, common sense, or law requiring the admission of any given territory to statehood until it and its inhabitants are fitted therefor.

Louisiana was annexed in 1803, and the northwest portion thereof was only admitted to statehood in 1890.

New Mexico and Arizona were annexed in 1849. They have not yet been admitted to statehood.

Alaska was annexed in 1867, and has not yet even been provided with a Territorial government.

If it is not inconsistent with law and American institutions to acquire territory and withhold statehood for thirty, fifty, and ninety years, why can not the same or any other territory be held for a hundred or any other period of years, until it is fitted for statehood?

If that time never comes, well and good. When it does come, if ever it does, is time to change its status, and neither in the making or changing of that status is there any violation of the principles of American institutions.

The treaty leaves the form of the government of Hawaii absolutely in the hands of Congress, providing that until changed by Congress the local laws not inconsistent with the United States Constitution shall continue in force.

Hawaii already possesses so fully organized a government that only a few general adaptive statutes will have to be enacted by Congress in order to create a fully equipped American Territorial government.

Johnson's point 8.—In paragraphs 22 and 23 he dwells on the "sordid policy," "unbefitting the genius of a great and free people," "to have territory under a government other than statehood, and enters a 'solemn protest against the consummation of this colossal blunder.'" (Paragraphs 22 and 23.)

Reply.—There is no connection between territory being held as a Territory and a "sordid policy."

The Territories of the United States have practically self-government in all local affairs. Their sole limitation is in participation in the Federal Government.

The limitations connected therewith are precisely the same as in the great self-governing colonial governments of Canada and Australia. In both cases local affairs are controlled by the local people, and in each case there is no participation in the Federal Government.

No one certainly will claim that the Canadian and Australian governments are the victims of a "sordid policy."

This talk is buncombe.

Johnson's point 9.—We do not need this territory in which to expand our population.

We shall not require an overflow for a century.

We have a vast empire sparsely settled.

Our 70,000,000 of people can be put into Texas alone without interfering with their freedom of action. (Paragraph 24.)

There is nothing in the national growth, either present or prospective, which requires annexation. (Paragraph 25.)

Reply.—The same argument would have excluded Louisiana, Florida,

Texas, and California.

All the population of the United States could to-day be accommodated east of the Mississippi, but it does not rationally follow that if the United States had remained east of the Mississippi only it would not have been beneficial to them to secure territory west of the Mississippi.

The physical possibility of squeezing a given population into a given territory is not the criterion by which the benefit of acquiring additional territory should be judged.

It may be physically possible for all the people now in the United States, or who may live there for a hundred years to come, to exist within the present limits of the country; but conditions have demonstrated that already the need of foreign markets for United States products is pressing.

The prime value of Hawaii to the United States is not by reason of the trade or area of Hawaii alone, but the vastly greater trade of the Pacific with which it is so intimately connected and which it so greatly controls.

Johnson's point 10.—"The acquisition of Hawaii means the strengthening, not of the centrifugal, but of the centrifugal force in this nation" (paragraph 26).

He favors "centralized and unified power" (paragraph 27), and opposes "the acquisition of insular territorial possessions, pursued in flagrant violation either of lines of latitude or longitude" (paragraph 28).

"Every island and every ignorant alien taken into the Union makes for dismemberment and disintegration" (paragraph 29).

Reply.—The objection that the acquiring of colonies and outlying territory tends to weaken the central government is directly contrary to the argument usually made in this connection, which is that the control by the central government of provinces which are not fully self-governing produces an undue centralization of power in the "central government."

So far from the acquisition of Hawaii being "pursued in flagrant violation either of lines of latitude or longitude," Hawaii is well within them.

Hawaii lies on almost the same line of latitude that Key West does, and lies 500 miles within the line of longitude bounding the western limit of the mainland of Alaska and more than a thousand miles within the line of longitude bounding the Aleutian and Midway islands, both of which belong to the United States.

So far as the inclusion of Hawaii within the boundaries of the Union tending to "disintegrate and dismember," the main object of acquiring Hawaii is to defend that which the United States already owns on the Pacific coast, and to protect its commerce upon the Pacific, which is rapidly growing to be the greatest in the world.

The local government of Hawaii will settle all local problems, of which there will be many, without involving the National Government or the people of other localities in the United States, any more than does the settlement of a county-seat fight or a local-option election in Arizona.

The people of Hawaii will not come to the United States. They can come here now if they choose to, but do not, because they are more prosperous at home than the people of the United States. Already the tide of immigration is toward and not from Hawaii.

Johnson's point 11.—It is a departure from the traditions of the country, a foolish experiment, to annex territory not contiguous. The one experiment, Alaska, is still an experiment. (Paragraphs 30-32.)

Reply.—There is no departure from the traditions of the country. The country has already made numerous annexations of insular territory.

MIDWAY ISLAND.

This island was annexed in 1868 by order of the executive department of the United States. The action taken thereunder is fully described in Senate Executive Document No. 70, Fortieth Congress, second session. An appropriation of $50,000 was made by the third session of the Fortieth Congress by act approved March 1, 1869.

This is contained in United States Statutes at Large, volume 15, chapter 48, page 279. It is also referred to in the Report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1870, on page 8, and Report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1871, pages 6, 7, and 8.

The object of the annexation was to create a naval station there. Midway Island is the westernmost of the Hawaiian group.

The appropriation was all spent, and an estimate made showing that it would cost some $400,000 more to open the harbor, which is a lagoon harbor with a bar of coral across at the entrance on which there is only 15 feet of water. The heavy expense and the loss of a war ship engaged in bringing away the laborers when the $50,000 was expended interfered with the continuance of the plan to make a naval station, but the island still belongs to the United States.

OTHER ISLAND ANNEXATIONS.

The United States owns the Aleutian Islands, extending a thousand miles west of Hawaii, which it acquired in conjunction with Alaska. It also owns fifty-seven other islands and groups of islands in the Pacific and thirteen in the Caribbean Sea, which have been taken possession of by American citizens under act of Congress dated August 18, 1856, which provides for the registration and protection of islands so annexed. The principal object of such annexations was to secure the guano located on such islands, but it only makes the precedent so much the stronger in that it indicates that so small a matter as the securing of a limited amount of fertilizer is sufficient reason for insular annexation.

The traditions of the country are to annex whatever territory or country is needed.

The fact that the greater portion of the territory annexed was not insular is no precedent or tradition against insular annexations when such annexations would be valuable to the country.

In other words, the question of whether the territory proposed to be annexed is insular or continental is not and should not be the criterion, but the deciding line is whether or not its annexation would be valuable to the United States.

The names, location, and date of acquisition of the islands which have become United States territory under the above-mentioned act of 1856 are as follows:

Johnson's point 12.—Hawaii was offered to the United States in 1853 and declined by President Pierce and Secretary of State Webster. (Par. 31.)

Reply.—Mr. Johnson is incorrect in saying that Hawaii was offered to the United States and declined.

The transaction which he refers to was the document which was dated March 10, 1851, to be found in volume 2, page 896, of the Morgan report to the Senate of 1894, being Senate Executive Document No. 45, Fifty-second Congress, second session.

The document mentioned simply states that by reason of the aggressions of the French, the King of Hawaii placed the country under the protection and safeguard of the United States of America, until some arrangements could be made to "place our said relations with France upon a footing compatible with my rights as an independent sovereign under the laws of nations, and compatible with my treaty engagements with other foreign nations," with the proviso that if such arrangements be impracticable the protection of the United States should be perpetual.

This document was delivered to the American minister in Hawaii, but the French learning thereof and ceasing their aggressions, no action was taken thereon by the United States.

Johnson's point 13.—The "possession of Hawaii means that they will be come a source of irritation for all time to come between ourselves and for other nations."

"Insular territorial possessions are a prolific source of contention." (Par. 34.)

Annexation will devolve upon the United States "the responsibility for their management and control."

"Vexed and annoying questions" will "arise with powerful maritime nations" concerning the "occupation by them of Hawaiian waters and harbors, the use of the islands for coaling stations, and the hundreds of controversies which are liable to arise with respect to this territory." (Par. 35.)

Reply.—The possession of Hawaii is far less liable to prove a source of "irritation with foreign nations" than is Hawaii's continued independence and the declaration of the United States which has been constantly reiterated that the United States will not allow any other country to control Hawaii.

So far as interference in Hawaii by other countries is concerned, this country is already committed to the full responsibility which ownership would devolve upon it, without any of the control of ownership.

Annexation will give the United States the control as well as the responsibility, while under the present status it has all the responsibility with no control to keep the islands from getting into difficulties with foreign governments.

Mr. JOHNSON states that "vexed and annoying questions will arise with foreign governments concerning the occupation of Hawaiian waters and harbors."

These are the very questions which will arise in case annexation does not take place, but which can not arise in case of annexation any more than they arise concerning the waters of California and Florida.

Mr. JOHNSON speaks of the "hundreds of controversies" which are liable to arise with respect to Hawaii.

What controversies will arise concerning Hawaii that do not arise in any other territory which the United States has annexed?

Johnson's point 14.—"This nation is practically invulnerable to successful attack from a foreign foe. The ocean forms an impassable barrier to dangerous aggression." (Par. 36.)

"We have a splendid navy and excellent coast defenses." (Par. 37.)

"Annexation will destroy our contiguity, take away our base of supplies, surrender the natural advantages of defense, and furnish a base of contention to fight over and defend in time of peace." (Par. 38.)

Reply.—The statement that the nation is now practically invulnerable, and that "the ocean forms an impassable barrier" to dangerous aggression, is considered by the military and naval authorities, and replied to in their statements contained in the pamphlet herewith.

They unite in the opinion that with the control of Hawaii the Pacific coast will be impregnable, but without its control it will be liable to attack.

Moreover, the proposition that the United States is safe by remaining on the continent does not cover the safety of its foreign commerce, which is now so large and rapidly growing.

So far from the acquisition of Hawaii "taking away the bases of supplies," it secures to the United States the base of supplies which controls a larger area of the earth's surface than any other one spot and prevents any foreign nation from securing a base of supplies from which the commerce and the coast of the United States on the Pacific can be interfered with.

Johnson's point 15.—In case of annexation we must fortify Hawaii. We must increase our Navy to defend and communicate with them. This will enormously increase appropriations. (Paragraph 48.)

Reply.—This also is replied to by the naval authorities cited above.

It will be necessary to maintain a navy in connection with American interests in the Pacific, but it will require a larger navy and expenditures to protect the Pacific coast without than with Hawaii.

The control of Hawaii, so far from being a source of expense, will be a measure of economy, in that by fortifying one point in Hawaii, the battle ships of all nations can be prevented from getting to the Pacific coast, because they can not carry coal enough to cross the Pacific without recouling at Hawaii.

Therefore the one fortification at Hawaii will answer the same object that would the fortification of all the principal points on the Pacific coast.

Johnson's point 16.—Annexation will form a bad precedent and will be followed by the annexation of Cuba and Samoa. (Paragraphs 45 and 46.)

This "will be fortified by artful sophistries of men who will pander to the national vanity and cupidity." (Paragraph 46.)

Annexation is, as a rule, a source of weakness. (Paragraph 46.)

Reply.—So far as precedent is concerned, the United States does not stand in need of any precedent in the way of annexing territory.

It has annexed territory all the way from the Tropics to the Arctic, on the Atlantic, the Gulf, the Pacific, and the islands of the Pacific, and in the Caribbean Sea.

So far as precedents are concerned, there are precedents enough on hand to form a basis of justification for annexing anything in the Western Hemisphere.

So far as the annexation of Hawaii is concerned, there is no parallel between it and the islands on the Atlantic side, for the reason that Hawaii stands alone as a base of supplies within practical steaming distance of the Pacific coast.

The securing of this one point removes practically all possible bases of trans-Pacific attack.

On the other hand, there are so many islands on the Atlantic side, any one of which can be made a base of attack, that in order to secure immunity from attack on that side all the islands must be annexed, a practical impossibility.

The status of Hawaii, therefore, is unique and entirely different from Cuba or any other Atlantic island.

Johnson's point 17.—The United States should heed the advice of Washington and "avoid all entangling alliances," and turn its attention to the development of its own resources. (Paragraph 51.)

"We shall be wise if we devote ourselves to internal development and growth." (Paragraphs 57 and 58.)

Reply.—The annexation of Hawaii is in direct conformity with the advice of Washington to "avoid entangling alliances."

The opponents of annexation have advocated in the past, and advocate now, that the United States should enter into a joint agreement with European nations concerning Hawaii, thereby directly entering an "entangling alliance."

By absorbing Hawaii the United States will remove the possibility of "entangling alliances" and will effectually eliminate Hawaii from international disagreements.

As long as Hawaii remains independent, without the power to maintain its independence, it will be a source of international irritation and be a menace to the peace of the Pacific.

The necessary incidentals to the development of internal resources are the development of foreign commerce, and Hawaii is directly incidental to the control of that commerce in that all the commerce to and from the Pacific and trans-Pacific nations must pass its door.

Johnson's point 18.—The United States is all powerful. All people realize our great strength and therefore seek no difficulty with us. (Paragraph 65.)

Reply.—Whether or not the strength of the United States is sufficient to prevent foreign aggressions is unnecessary to discuss in view of current events.

The reiterated sentiments of Washington, Jackson, and others, "that preparedness for war is the most certain method of maintaining peace," applies as well to Hawaii as it does to Spain.

The history of the Navy belies the statement that it has bred a "spirit of insouciance."

The incidents of the day demonstrate more than argument the necessity of a navy, and if the United States is to have any navy on the Pacific it must, in order to maintain its control of the Pacific, have a coaling station at Hawaii, and it can not have that coaling station in time of war unless it owns the country.

I have taken pains also to prepare declarations from distinguished statesmen of the country. I make the statement that there has not been given one single statement, except that one to which I have already referred about the northern harbors, that has not been made over and over again by statesmen that have gone before us, from all sections of the country, growing not only out of the admission of territory as States, but the acquisition of territory without specific declaration of law authorizing it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I advocate the adoption of this resolution upon a ground wholly distinct from any question of war necessity. I believe that the growth of the commerce of this country, independent of anything which is to result from the war, is in very large part bound up in the acquisition of this half-way house to the great markets of the East by way of the Pacific Ocean. I find that the intelligent people upon the Pacific slope are keenly alive to this proposition, and have been for many months. I am not going to turn aside here to assail any influence or interest that is opposing this matter. If there is not anything stronger in opposition to it than the sordid interests of somebody that acquired special advantages by reason of a treaty that never ought to have been made—if there is nothing stronger than that, the argument will not stand.

If we have to stand on no stronger ground than the overriding of interests, they will not stand in this House. I stand on grounds that have more to justify them than any such statements. The Government which to-day is in power, it is said, believes that there is to-day a military necessity for the acquisition of these islands. I want to say right here on that question I take the word of those who know more than I do. I know nothing personally of that subject. My opinion on this general question was born before this Administration was elected to office. I was just as zealous for the acquisition of these islands before 1896 as I have ever been since.

And we are told that there is an absolute and indispensable necessity for the acquisition of these islands. Now, let us see what is probably going on at this moment of time, while we are discussing the question whether we will take from the people of Hawaii the magnificent, the princely gift they come here and offer; and in the argument I shall submit in writing, which will be printed, I will show the gentlemen that there has been no higher demonstration of popular approval, nor can there be, than has been made by the people of these islands in favor of annexation. It is not true that the intelligence is opposed to annexation. It is not true that the people of these islands are uneducated and do not know what is being done for them by others.

I will put into my remarks proof positive that will make some of us here in this boasted land of education somewhat doubtful of the laurels of our educators when they read the facts as to development of education in the Hawaiian Islands. It is a mistake to let it be understood that we are trying to annex a barbarian population. We are trying to annex an intelligence, whether in the majority or in the minority, an intelligence that has approved under the forms of law this act as it has always been approved when we have acquired territory either by treaty or by purchase.

Gentlemen talk about a plebiscite, and the gentleman from Missouri is willing to have a vote, as I understood his argument. When was the like of that ever done in the history of nations? It is said that Texas ratified something that had already been done. But would it ever have made any difference to the status of Texas in this nation if she had voted the other way? It was a fact accomplished, and she approved of it, to the glory of the common sense of her people and the mighty building up of this Government of ours. While we are debating this question the people of Honolulu are standing with outstretched arms to embrace the men of the United States who are going to the Orient to fight for and to uphold the flag of our country.

While we are charging them with being barbarians they are violating every law of neutrality and exposing themselves to the wrath of every foreign government which is opposed to our success and our progress, and throwing themselves upon the generosity of the people of the United States; and what are they offering to us now? They are offering to us a place where the eagle of war, not the dove of peace, but the eagle of war that has been sent out from the ark of this mighty nation, may rest its foot on the soil of a free and friendly country, while the men from these transports may take fresh courage and fresh hope and fresh vigor to go forward to victory at Manila. [Applause.]

They are offering us an indispensable resting place, so out of these crowded and fever-breeding transports the free men of this country may step forth and bless God that there is a halfway house to their destination owned and occupied by her people, a liberty-loving people, friends of the United States, and they may raise the banner of the United States now upon these islands and it will never be pulled down while the sun of God shines in the firmament. [Applause.] Every principle of self-aggrandizement, every principle of loyalty and friendship, every principle of duty to country, calls upon us without distinction to wheel into line on this magnificent onward march.

Now, gentlemen, when this is accomplished as an independent proposition, I scorn to discuss with any man what is to come of this acquisition. Here is an argument which has been made, and if ultimately carried to its utmost extent, let me tell you what might come. It is said that if we took Honolulu you have entered upon a system of territorial aggrandizement. What will come of it? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], with that wonderful prophetic forecast of mind, sees coming up here into this House of Representatives all sorts of horrors; and I imagine, if he had stood at the opening of Manila Harbor when Dewey, in the gray light of dawn, heading the magnificent fleet into that harbor, began to destroy the enemy, my friend would have cried out, "Hold on! Hold on! There is danger that something may come out of this in the future!" [Laughter.]

Let us discharge our duty in the present and trust to the Benign Being and the intelligence of the American people that all questions which shall arise hereafter will be settled wisely, patriotically, and that out of the smoke of the battle, out of the triumph of our arms in war, this country, anchored on the intelligence of its own people, and trusting to God, will go forward to be the light of the world and the home of the free. [Prolonged applause.]

APPENDIX A.

On April 4, 1864, it was resolved without dissent by the House of Representatives that "the Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to have the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the Republic of Mexico, and that they think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge any monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America under the auspices of any European power."

We recognize the right of sovereign nations to carry on war with each other, if they do not invade our right or menace our safety or just influence. The real cause of our national discontent is that the French army which is now in Mexico is invading a domestic republican government there, which was established by her people and with whom the United States sympathizes most profoundly, for the avowed purpose of suppressing it and establishing upon its ruins a foreign monarchical government, whose presence there, so long as it should endure, could not but be regarded by the people of the United States as injurious and menacing to their own chosen and endeared republican institutions. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, to Mr. de Montholon, December 6, 1865; MSS. Notes, France.)

It has been the President's purpose that France should be respectfully informed upon two points, namely: First, that the United States earnestly desire to continue and to cultivate sincere friendship with France; secondly, that this policy will be brought into imminent jeopardy unless France could deem it consistent with her interest and honor to desist from the prosecution of armed intervention in Mexico to overthrow the domestic government existing there, and to establish upon its ruins the foreign monarchy which has been attempted to be inaugurated in the capital of that country. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, to Mr. Bigelow, December 16, 1865; MSS. France.)

On April 6, 1866, Mr. Motley was instructed by Mr. Seward to state to the Austrian Government "that in the event of hostilities being carried on hereafter in Mexico by Austrian subjects, under the command or with the sanction of the Government at Vienna, the United States will feel themselves at liberty to regard those hostilities as constituting a state of war by Austria against the Republic of Mexico; and in regard to such war waged at this time and under existing circumstances the United States could not engage to remain assiduous and neutral spectators."

"The revolution which recently occurred in Mexico was followed by the accession of the successful party to power and the installation of its chief, Gen. Porfirio Diaz, in the Presidential office. It has been the custom of the United States, when such changes of government have heretofore occurred in Mexico, to recognize and enter into official relations with the de facto Government as soon as it should appear to have the approval of the Mexican people and should manifest a disposition to adhere to the obligations of the treaties and international friendship."

"In the summer of 1864 a conference was held by the ministers of the United States accredited at London, Paris, and Madrid, with a view to consult on the negotiations which it might be advisable to carry on simultaneously at these several courts for the satisfactory adjustment with Spain of the affairs connected with Cuba. The joint dispatch of Messrs. Buchanan, Mason, and Soule to the Secretary of State, dated Aix-la-Chapelle, October 18, 1864, after remarking that the United States had never acquired a foot of territory, not even after a successful war with Mexico, except by purchase or by the voluntary application of the people, as in the case of Texas, thus proceeds: 'Our past history forbids that we should acquire the island of Cuba without the consent of Spain, unless justified by the great law of self-preservation.'

"We must, in any event, preserve our own conscious rectitude and our self-respect. Whilst pursuing this course we can afford to disregard the censures of the world, to which we have been so often and so unjustly exposed. After we shall have offered Spain a price for Cuba far beyond its present value and this shall have been refused, it will then be time to consider the question, Does Cuba, in the possession of Spain, seriously endanger our internal peace and the existence of our cherished Union? Should this question be answered in the affirmative, then by every law, human and divine, we shall be justified in wresting it from Spain, if we possess the power; and this upon the very same principle that would justify an individual in tearing down the burning house of his neighbor if there were no other means of preventing the flames from destroying his own home."

"Under such circumstances we ought neither to count the cost nor regard the odds which Spain might enlist against us. We forbear to enter into the question whether the present condition of the island would justify such a measure. We should, however, be recreant to our duty, be unworthy of our gallant forefathers, and commit base treason against our posterity should we permit Cuba to be Africanized and become a second San Domingo, with all its attendant horrors to the white race, and suffer the flames to extend to our own neighboring shores, seriously to endanger or actually to consume the fair fabric of our Union. And lest there might be any misapprehension of this language as implying the alternative of cession and seizure, except as the result of absolute necessity, Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, writes, November 13, 1854, to Mr. Soule:

"To conclude that, on a rejection of a proposition to cede, seizure should ensue, would be to assume that self-preservation necessitates the acquisition of Cuba by the United States; that Spain has refused and will persist in refusing our reclamations for injuries and wrongs inflicted, and that she will make no arrangement for our future security against the recurrence of similar injuries and wrongs." (Congressional Document, Thirty-third Congress, second session, H. R. No. 93.)

"The United States have regarded the existing authorities in the Sandwich Islands as a government suited to the condition of the people and resting on their own choice; and the President is of opinion that the interests of all commercial nations require that that Government should not be interfered with by foreign powers. Of the vessels which visit the islands it is known that the great majority belong to the United States. The United States, therefore, are more interested in the fate of the islands and of their Government than any other nation can be; and this consideration induces the President to be quite willing to declare, as the sense of the Government of the United States, that the Government of the Sandwich Islands ought to be respected; that no power ought neither to take possession of the islands as a conquest or for the purpose of colonization, and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing Government or any exclusive privileges of preference with its matters of commerce." (Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Haallio & Richards, December 10, 1842. 6 Webster's Works, 478.)

"Owing to their locality and to the course of the winds which prevail in this quarter of the world, the Sandwich Islands are the stopping place for almost all vessels passing from continent to continent across the Pacific Ocean. They are especially resorted to by the great numbers of vessels of the United States which are engaged in the whale fishery in those seas. The number of vessels of all sorts and the amount of property owned by the citizens of the United States which are found in these islands in the course of a year are stated, probably with sufficient accuracy, in the letters of the agents."

"Just emerging from a state of barbarism, the Government of the islands is as yet feeble; but its dispositions appear to be just and pacific, and it seems anxious to improve the condition of its people by the introduction of knowledge, of religious and moral institutions, means of education, and the arts of civilized life."

"It can not be but in conformity with the interest and the wishes of the Government and the people of the United States that this community, thus existing in the midst of a vast expanse of ocean, should be respected and all its rights strictly and conscientiously regarded. And this must also be the true interest of all other commercial states. Far remote from the dominions of European powers, its growth and prosperity as an independent state may yet be in a high degree useful to all whose trade is extended to those regions, while its nearer approach to this continent and the intercourse American vessels have with it, such vessels constituting five-sixths of all which annually visit it, could not but create dissatisfaction on the part of the United States at any attempt by another power, should such an attempt be threatened or feared, to take possession of the islands, colonize them, and subvert the native Government."

Considering, therefore, that the United States possess so large a share in the intercourse with those islands, it is deemed not unfit to make the declaration that their Government seeks, nevertheless, no peculiar advantages, no exclusive control over the Hawaiian Government, but is content with its independent existence, and anxiously wishes for its security and prosperity. Its forbearance in this respect under the circumstances of the very large intercourse which American vessels have with the islands should justify this Government, should events hereafter arise to require it, in making a decided remonstrance against the adoption of an opposite policy by any other power. Under the circumstances, I recommend to Congress to provide for a moderate allowance, to be made out of the Treasury, to the consul residing there, that in a Government so new and a country so remote American citizens may have respectable authority to which to apply for redress in case of an injury to their persons and property, and to whom the Government of the country may also make known any acts committed by American citizens of which it may think it has a right to complain. (Message of President Tyler, December 30, 1842; 6 Webster's Works, 463-464.)

The Hawaiian Islands bear such peculiar relations to ourselves that "we even feel justified, consistently with our own principles, in interfering by force to prevent their falling (by conquest) into the hands of one of the great powers of Europe." (Mr. Legare, Secretary of State, to Mr. Everett, June 13, 1843; MSS. Inst., Great Britain.)

The Department will be slow to believe that the French have any intention to adopt with reference to the Sandwich Islands the same policy which they have pursued in regard to Tahiti. If, however, in your judgment, it should be warranted by circumstances, you may take a proper opportunity to intimate to the minister for foreign affairs of France that the situation of the Sandwich Islands in respects to our possessions on the Pacific, and the bonds, commercial and of other descriptions, between them and the United States are such that we could never with indifference allow them to pass under the dominion or exclusive control of any other power. We do not ourselves covet sovereignty over them. We would be content that they should remain under their present rulers, who, we believe, are disposed to be just and impartial in their dealings with all nations. (Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State, to Mr. Rives, July 5, 1850; MSS. Inst., France.)

"The proceedings of M. Dillon and the French admiral there, in 1849, so far as we are informed respecting them, seem, both in their origin and in their nature, to have been incompatible with any just regard for the Hawaiian Government as an independent state. They can not, according to our impressions, be accounted for upon any other hypothesis than a determination on the part of those officers to humble and annihilate that Government for refusing to accede to demands which, if granted, must have been at the expense of all self-respecting and substantial sovereignty. The further enforcement of those demands which, it appears is the object of Mr. Perrin's mission, would be tantamount to a subjugation of the islands to the dominion of France. A step like this could not fail to be viewed by the Government and people of the United States with a dissatisfaction which would tend seriously to disturb our existing friendly relations with the French Government.

"This is a result to be deplored. If, therefore, it should not be too late, it is hoped that you will make such representations upon the subject to the minister of the foreign office of France as will induce that Government to desist from measures incompatible with the sovereignty and independence of the Hawaiian Islands, and to make amends for the acts which the French agents have already committed there in contravention of the law of nations and of the treaty between the Hawaiian Government and France." (Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, to Mr. Rives, June 19, 1851. MSS. Inst., France.)

"The Hawaiian Islands are ten times nearer to the United States than to any of the powers of Europe. Five sixths of all their commercial intercourse is with the United States, and these considerations, together with others of a more general character, have fixed the course which the United States Government will pursue in regard to them. The announcement of this policy will not surprise the Governments of Europe, nor be thought to be unreasonable by the nations of the civilized world; and that policy is that while the Government of the United States itself, faithful to its original assurance, scrupulously regards the independence of the Hawaiian Islands, it can never consent to see those islands taken possession of by either of the great commercial countries of Europe, nor can it consent that demands manifestly unjust and derogatory and inconsistent with a bona fide independence shall be enforced against that Government." (Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, to Mr. Severance, July 14, 1851. MSS. Inst., Hawaii.)

"I do not think that the present Hawaiian Government can long remain in the hands of the present rulers or under control of the native inhabitants of these islands, and both England and France are apprised of our determination not to allow them to be owned by or to fall under the protection of these powers or any other European nation.

"It seems to be inevitable that they must come under the control of this Government, and it would be but reasonable and fair that these powers should acquiesce in such a disposition of them, provided the transference was effected by fair means." (Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, to Mr. Mason, December 16, 1853. MSS. Inst., France.)

"This Government will receive the transfer of the sovereignty of the Sandwich Islands, with all proper provisions relative to the existing rights and interests of the people thereof, such as are usual and appropriate to territorial sovereignty. It will be the object of the United States, if clothed with the sovereignty of that country, to promote its growth and prosperity. This consideration alone ought to be a sufficient assurance to the people that their rights and interests will be duly cherished by this Government." (Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, to Mr. Gregg, January 31, 1855. MSS. Inst., Hawaii.)

"The acquisition of territory beyond the sea, outside the present confines of the United States, meets the opposition of many discreet men who have more or less influence in our councils. It can not be entered upon without very grave deliberation and in full view of all the advantages and disadvantages that may result.

"This question, in its relation to the Sandwich Islands, is full of interest, and has long attracted as a possible question the attention of many persons here as well as in those islands. It seems that events are likely to precipitate it upon us for consideration as a practical question.

"The position of the Sandwich Islands as an outpost fronting and commanding the whole of our possessions on the Pacific Ocean gives to the future of those islands a peculiar interest to the Government and people of the United States. It is very clear that this Government can not be expected to assent to their transfer from their present control to that of any powerful maritime or commercial nation. Such transfer to a maritime nation would threaten a military surveillance in the Pacific similar to that which Bermuda has afforded in the Atlantic. The latter has been submitted to from necessity, inasmuch as it was congenial with our Government, but we desire no additional similar outposts in the hands of those who may at some future time use them to our disadvantage." (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pierce, March 25, 1873. MSS. Inst., Hawaii.)

"The United States was one of the first among the great nations of the world to take an active interest in the upbuilding of Hawaiian independence and the creation of a new and potential life for its people. It has consistently endeavored, and with success, to enlarge the material prosperity of Hawaii on such independent basis. It proposes to be equally unremitting in its efforts hereafter to maintain and develop the advantages which have accrued to Hawaii and to draw closer the ties which imperatively unite it to the great body of American Commonwealths.

"In this line of action the United States does its simple duty both to Hawaii and itself, and it can not permit such obvious neglect of national interest as would be involved by silent acquiescence in any movement looking to a lessening of those American ties and the substitution of the alien and hostile interests. It firmly believes that the position of the Hawaiian Islands as the key to the dominion of the American Pacific demands their neutrality, to which end it will earnestly cooperate with the native Government. And if, through any cause the maintenance of such a position of neutrality should be found by Hawaii to be impracticable, this Government would then unhesitatingly meet the altered situation by seeking an avowedly American solution for the grave issues presented." (Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State, to Mr. Comly, December 1, 1881. MSS., Hawaii.)

"There is little doubt that were the Hawaiian Islands, by annexation or distinct protection a part of the territory of the Union, their fertile resources for the growth of rice and sugar would not only be controlled by American capital, but so profitable a field of labor would attract intelligent workers thither from the United States.

"A purely American form of colonization in such a case would meet all the phases of the problem. Within our border could be found the capital, the intelligence, the activity, and the necessary labor trained in the rice swamps and cane fields of the Southern States. And it may be well to consider how, even in the chosen alternative of maintaining Hawaiian independence, these prosperous elements could be induced to go from our shores to the islands, not like the coolies, practically enslaved, not as human machines, but as thinking, intelligent, working factors in the advancement of the material interests of the islands." (Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State, to Mr. Comly, December 1, 1881. MSS. Inst., Hawaii.)

"The United States are not averse to having the great powers know that they publicly recognize the peculiar relations between them and Liberia, and that they are prepared to take every proper step to maintain them. To this end it is not inexpedient that you, and Mr. Lowell also on his return to his post from his present leave, should evince a lively interest in the movements of both Great Britain and France in the neighborhood of Liberia, without, however, showing any undue anxiety or offensive curiosity in the matter." (Mr. Evarts, Secretary of State, to Mr. Hoppin, April 21, 1880. MSS. Inst., Great Britain.)

"In its intercourse with foreign nations the Government of the United States has from its origin always recognized de facto governments. We recognize the right of all nations to create and reform their political institutions according to their own will and pleasure. We do not go behind the existing government to involve ourselves in the question of legitimacy. It is sufficient for us to know that a government exists capable of maintaining itself, and then its recognition on our part inevitably follows. This principle of action, resulting from our sacred regard for the independence of nations, has occasioned some strange anomalies in our history. The Pope, the Emperor of Russia, and President Jackson were the only authorities on earth which ever recognized Don Miguel as King of Portugal.

"Whilst this is our settled policy, it does not follow that we can ever be indifferent spectators to the progress of liberty throughout the world, and especially in France. We can never forget the obligations which we owe to that generous nation for their aid at the darkest period of our Revolutionary war in achieving our own independence. Those obligations have been transmitted from father to son, from generation to generation, and are still gratefully remembered. They yet live freshly in the hearts of our countrymen. It was, therefore, with one universal burst of enthusiasm that the American people hailed the late glorious revolution in France in favor of liberty and republican government. In this feeling the President strongly sympathizes. Warm aspirations for the success of the new republic are breathed from every heart. Liberty and order will make France happy and prosperous. Her destinies, under Providence, are now in the hands of the French people. Let them, by their wisdom, firmness, and moderation refute the slanders of their enemies and convince the world that they are capable of self-government." (Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, to Mr. Rush, March 31, 1848. MSS. Inst., France.)

"The prompt recognition of the new government by the representative of the United States at the French court meets my full and unqualified approbation, and he has been authorized in a suitable manner to make known this fact to the constituted authorities of the French Republic. Called upon to act upon a sudden emergency, which could not have been anticipated by his instructions, he judged rightly of the feelings and sentiments of his Government and of his countrymen when, in advance of the diplomatic representatives of other countries, he was the first to recognize, so far as it was in his power, the free Government established by the French people.

"The policy of the United States has ever been that of nonintervention in the domestic affairs of other countries, leaving to each to establish the form of government of its own choice. While this wise policy will be maintained toward France, now suddenly transformed from a monarchy into a Republic, all our sympathies are naturally enlisted on the side of a great people who, imitating our example, have resolved to be free. That such sympathy should exist on the part of the people of the United States with the friends of free government in every part of the world, and especially in France, is not remarkable. We can never forget that France was our early friend in eventful Revolution and generously aided us in shaking a foreign yoke and becoming a free and independent people." (President Polk, special message, April 8, 1843.)

"We, as a nation, have ever been ready and willing to recognize any government de facto which appeared capable of maintaining its power; and should either a republican form of government or that of a limited monarchy (founded on a popular and permanent basis) be adopted by any of the states of Germany, we are bound to be the first, if possible, to hail the new government and to cheer it in every progressive movement that has for its aim the attainment of the priceless and countless blessings of freedom." (Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State, to Mr. Donelson, July 3, 1849. MSS. Inst., Prussia.)

"Your dispatches of the 10th of November, Nos. 5 and 6, have been received. In your No. 5 you announce that a revolution has taken place in Costa Rica, which was effected by the mere display of military force, unresisted, and without effusion of blood. You further announce that in that movement the President, Señor Castro, was deposed, and the first provisional substitute, Señor Jimenez, had assumed the executive power. The further transactions mentioned are an acquiescence of the several provinces, the suspension of the constitution, and the call of a national convention to adopt a new constitution. As a consequence of these events you have recognized the new President, subject to direction on the occasion from the President of the United States. It does not belong to the Government or people of the United States to examine the causes which have led to this revolution, or to pronounce upon the exigency which they created. Nevertheless, great as that exigency may have been, the subversion of a free republican constitution, only nine years old, by military force, in a sister American Republic, can not but be an occasion of regret and apprehension to the friends of the system of the republican government, not only here, but throughout the world. It only remains to say that the course which you have pursued is approved, inasmuch as it appears that there is not only no civil war, but no government contending with the one which has been established." (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, to Mr. Blair, December 1, 1863. MSS. Inst., Costa Rica.)

"In your last dispatch you informed this Department that the Chilean Government refused absolutely to recognize General Pierola as representing the civil authority in Peru, and that Señor Calderon was at the head of a provisional government.

"If the Calderon government is supported by the character and intelligence of Peru, and is really endeavoring to restore constitutional government with a view both to order within and negotiation with Chile for peace, you may recognize it as the existing provisional government, and render what aid you can by advice and good offices to that end.

"Mr. Elmore has been received by me as the confidential agent of such provisional government." (Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State, to Mr. Christianity, May 9, 1881. MSS. Inst., Peru.)

"The question of recognition of foreign revolutionary or reactionary governments is one exclusively for the Executive, and can not be determined internationally by Congressional action." (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, to Mr. Dayton, April 7, 1864. MSS. Inst., France.)

Jefferson's letter to Breckenridge, August 12, 1803:

"The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign property, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of the country has done an act beyond the Constitution. The legislature, in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it."—Jefferson's Writings, volume 3, page 512.

C. J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania (January 5, 1845, House of Representatives):
 "I shall merely add that if we can acquire foreign territory by purchase or by conquest, if these are rights appurtenant to natural sovereignty, I do not see why we may not by act of Congress, by compact, though it be not by treaty technically so called."

Mr. Belser, of Alabama:
 "This is a question that has been already decided by that omnipotent tribunal, the people, and enough has been said upon it throughout the Union. When gentlemen say that the legislative power of this Government had no right to annex foreign territory to it, I ask them to point out any express power in the Constitution which authorized the treaty-making power to do it. The treaty-making power has acquired territory as an incident of sovereignty in the legislative department to erect new States out of territory acquired by law, as it is to obtain the territory out of which they were to be formed by treaty."

Mr. Payne, of Alabama:
 "In regard to the power of this Government to admit new States into the Union, I propose to refer to a clause in the Constitution which settles that question. 'New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union.' In regard to this the Constitution is clear and express."

Mr. Douglas, of Illinois:
 "I am one of those who believe that there is nothing to fear from the acquisition of freemen to the States of this Union, or of territory to this Republic, and while I would not violate treaty stipulations or the law of nations in any respect, I would use all legal means to extend the territory of this Republic from the Atlantic to the Pacific and drive from this continent the last vestige of foreign power."

Mr. Yancy:
 "Like the star which of old drew the shepherds' attention from their humble pursuits to the manger where slept the Saviour of the world, does this culminate over an infant republic, appealing to us as freemen to forego our wrangling and to accomplish in harmony the great destiny to which our principles devote us—the spread of the blessing of our liberty."

Mr. Bayley:
 "The importance of Texas as a means of military defense, and its consequent intimate connection with the war power, I shall show hereafter. If we might go to war to prevent Texas from falling into the hands of a foreign power, may we not still more effectually provide against it by her peaceable acquisition? * * * Authority for the admission of new States carries with it everything which is necessary and proper to accomplish it, and Congress may take such initiatory steps as may be necessary. * * * I maintain that independent of the authority to admit Texas into the Union, derived from the war power and the power to admit new States, she may be admitted by virtue of the power in Congress not to make treaties, for it has no such power, but to contract alliances, enter into confederacies, and make agreements and compacts, each of which powers I have shown Congress to possess."

Mr. Owen, of Indiana:
 "A sovereign power without the power of receiving an accession of domain would be an anomaly in jurisprudence, if not a contradiction in terms."

Citing Grotius:
 "According to the law of nations, not only the person who makes war upon just grounds, but anyone whatever engaged in regular and formal war becomes absolute proprietor of everything which he takes from the enemy, so that all nations respect his title and the title of all who derive through him claim to such possessions, which as to all constitutes the true idea of dominion. * * * Nations have decided that a person is understood to have made a capture when he detains a thing in such a manner that the owner has abandoned all probable hope of recovering it."

Citing Webster's reply to Buchanan:
 "The Government of the United States does not maintain and never has maintained the doctrine of perpetuity of natural allegiance. And surely Mexico maintains no such doctrine, because her actual existing Government, like that of the United States, is founded on the principle that men may throw off the obligation of that allegiance to which they were born."

Also Vattel:
 "Some writers confine this term (civil war) to a just insurrection of the subjects against their sovereign, to distinguish that lawful resistance from rebellion which is an open and unjust resistance. * * * The sovereign never fails, indeed, to bestow the appellation of rebels on all such of his subjects as openly resist him; but when the latter have acquired sufficient strength to give him effectual opposition and to oblige him to carry on the war according to the established rules, he must necessarily submit to the term 'civil war.'"

Shepherd Cary:
 "I would ask wherein Congress would exceed its authority by admitting Texas by legislative enactment? It is authorized by the Constitution to make all laws to carry its provisions into effect; and authority clearly grants the power to admit new States."

Mr. Dean, of Ohio:
 "One of the greatest incitements with me to annex Texas is that we might extend the blessings of civil and religious liberty which we enjoy. I would rejoice to see our free institutions extended throughout this continent."

Mr. Bowlin, of Missouri:
 "The acquisition of territory is one of our inherent rights as a sovereign power. * * * I would ask if at the time the Constitution was adopted the powers of Europe were not enlarging their territories and the spheres of their power? And can we suppose that the framers of the Constitution intended to deny to the confederated States the power to extend the limits of this Republic beyond those to which it was then confined? Can it be supposed that such a thing ever entered their minds for a single moment? No; they intended to place the Government on a basis which would make it as powerful as any government on the face of the globe—one whose influence should be spread with its civil and religious liberties to the utmost possible limits."

Mr. Benton:
 "The annexation of Texas is a great national measure and should never be degraded into anything sectional or partisan."

Mr. Atchison:
 "Texas has a right to transfer and the Government of the United States the right to accept the territory of Texas without giving any just cause of offense to any other power."

Mr. Hammett, of Mississippi:
 "She offers us her republican spirit; she offers us her wide domain; she offers us the valor of her sons and gives us a guaranty that if ever dangers threaten our land the spirit of San Jacinto would make common cause with that of Louisiana."

Mr. Rhett, of South Carolina:
 "If it is admitted that the treaty-making power is authorized to do that to which there is no express reference made in the Constitution (viz, to purchase territory), why can not the Congress, to which the power is expressly given, use the same means or any other means to acquire this territory out of which they are expressly authorized to admit new States?"

Mr. Caldwell, of Kentucky:

"We present the astonishing spectacle to the world of having offered to us such a boon as has been offered to no nation of the earth, and yet we are standing here debating whether we will accept the proffered boon. To me this is the greatest matter of wonder and astonishment."

Mr. White, of Kentucky:

"This bill is one in execution of a system of policy countenanced by the Government during half of its existence, and it is as familiar to the Constitution as the preamble to the Constitution itself."

Mr. Picklin, of Illinois:

"I knew this not as a party or sectional measure, whether Southern or Northern, but as one having 'as large a charter as the wind,' and coextensive with the varied interests of soil and climate of our great and glorious Republic. * * * The progress of civilization will be promoted, hand in hand with the spirit of the age, where beneficent light will permeate to those dark abodes where ignorance, superstition, and crime have reigned."

Senator Walker (February, 1845):

"The clause authorizing Congress to admit new States into the Union was not confined to our existing territory, but was without limitation, and the framers of the Constitution had expressly refused to limit the general power contained in this clause to the territory then embraced in the Union. The general power, then, is in express words, and no man has a right to interpolate restrictions, and especially restrictions which the framers of the Constitution had rejected."

Senator Merrick:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union. How plain, how explicit, how comprehensive. Language could not be plainer and words could not show more plainly and more directly our authority and power to pass the joint resolution now on the table than these words."

Senator McDuffie:

"Has Congress the power to admit a new State into the Union arising without the limits of the original territory of the United States? I believe there has not been a Senator on that side of the House (excepting, perhaps, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts) who has not admitted that the Government of the United States, through one of its departments, may acquire territory, and that the Congress of the United States may admit new States erected out of that territory thus acquired. * * * Senators must stand upon the plain, express grant as it is, or they must stand upon no grant at all."

"This is the simple alternative: The powers of the Constitution either intended, as honorable Senators have said, to confine the powers of Congress to the admission of territory that existed within the limits of the Union at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, or there is no limitation at all in relation to the admission of territory. * * * Do gentlemen on the other side find in the Constitution such a rule as this, that territory can only be acquired, first by the treaty-making power, and then admitted by Congress? It is not so written in the Constitution. * * * Is there anything there to prove that territory can be acquired at all by the treaty-making power?"

"If this clause authorizing Congress to admit new States into the Union did not exist, if there had been no clause on the subject, if foreign territory is to be acquired at all, the power properly belongs to Congress. * * *

Which is the more dangerous, to acquire territory by Congress or by purchase? If it is acquired by Congress, it is done at all events by the same power which is to pay for it and by the same power that exercises the war-making power. * * * Now, in regard to precedents upon the subject. If my recollection is correct, Scotland was united to England by a mutual act of Parliament. * * * and it was also by an act of Parliament that Ireland was united to England."

Senator Allen (February 25, 1845):

"What England wants are stations about the world to promote her commerce and navigation. At the Congress of Vienna, where the smaller kingdoms of Europe were unceremoniously partitioned among different nations, she did not ask for a part of the Kingdom of Saxony or Italy, but she asked for a few islands, forest and rocks. She wanted Malta, and she retained it. She was perfectly willing to see Norway, Italy, Saxony, the ancient German Empire, etc., partitioned off to Austria and other powers, but she held on to her strong posts. She held on to the costly Canadas, and spent millions in putting down rebellion there when even in peace they were a dead expense. Was this merely to gratify a desire for territorial possessions? Certainly not, for England is wise and calculating; but it was for gain."

"She had Halifax, a great naval depot, which affords her the means of annoying our commerce in time of war. She has a long line of frontier and she retains the Canadas to aid her in hemming us in. One of her prime ministers acknowledged that the people were taxed to the starving point, yet Canada was held fast. Look at the line which was adopted in the Ashburton treaty. A ridge of mountains was acquired by her as a barrier against us. It was not Peel, but Wellington—the military spirit of Wellington—who dictated that line. Why these preparations on the part of Great Britain? Because she foresees a commercial rivalry."

Senator Walker:

"What Government in the world, from ancient to modern times, ever confined itself to the rule that it could not enlarge its territory?"

Senator Buchanan:

"What new States? The convention has answered that question in letters of light, by rejecting the proposed limitation of this grant, which would have confined it to States lawfully arising in the United States."

Senator Yates (January 11, 1871; part 1, third session, Forty-second Congress, page 430):

"Because we are free and have risen to a high scale of civilization, morality, and independence, it is argued that we should not extend freedom and liberty to others. It was to be ruin to the Government if we annexed Louisiana and Florida. It was to be ruin with the $10,000,000 debt of Texas; ruin if we took California; ruin if we took New Mexico."

Senator STEWART (part 1, third session, Forty-second Congress, page 429):

"So long as our destiny continues to be growth, so long as it continues to be prosperity, so long will it continue to be expansion."

Senator Cox (part 1, third session, Forty-second Congress, page 408):

"I belong to the school which believes the greater nation will gradually absorb the less on this continent."

Senator Stevenson (part 1, third session, Forty-second Congress, page 400):

"Some gentlemen seem to fear the expansion of the Republic. Such fears have haunted every epoch of our national growth as we have spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific, yet every acquisition has proved a priceless treasure."

Senator Pomeroy (part 1, third session Forty-second Congress, page 200):

"It is no question of cheap sugar or cheap tobacco with me, or of dollars and cents particularly. It is a question whether we have a government that can be extended over a people for their benefit and not to our injury."

Senator Morton (part 1, third session Forty-second Congress, page 277):

"The annexation of San Domingo will come. I prophesy here to-night that it will come. It may not come in the time of General Grant or in my time, but I believe it is destined to come, and with it, too, the annexation of Cuba and Puerto Rico."

APPENDIX B.

Report of L. A. Thurston on the Hawaiian anti-annexation petition.

The petition consists of 556 pages, of which 308 pages contain what purport to be male signatures and 248 pages female signatures.

NUMBER OF NAMES.

The number of male signatures purports to be..... 10,378
The number of female signatures purports to be..... 10,801

Making the total number of signatures..... 21,209

NUMBER OF ADULTS.

The petition contains a column in which, opposite each name, the age of each petitioner purports to be written.

THE MALE PETITION

contains a summary in which it is stated that the adult signers number 8,116, and the minors between the ages of 14 and 20 years 2,262, making the total of 10,378 males.

THE FEMALE PETITION

contains no summary of adults and minors, but examination thereof shows that there purport to be—adults, 8,215; under 20 years of age, 2,676.
The face of the petition, therefore, shows that there are:

	Adults.	Minors.
Male.....	8,116	2,262
Female.....	8,215	2,676
Total.....	16,331	4,938

PERCENTAGE OF MINORS.

It thus appears, even from the face of the petition, that 29 per cent of the petitioners are minors.

There is strong reason to believe that a much larger number of the petitioners are minors, for reasons hereinafter stated.

REASONS FOR DISCREDITING THE PETITION.

The following facts, tending to discredit both the genuineness and the good faith of the petition, appear upon its face.

FIRST FACT TENDING TO DISCREDIT THE PETITION.

The certificate or summary accompanying the male petition states that the minors are all between 14 and 20 years of age.

The petition shows on its face that there are 350 male petitioners and 327 female petitioners, or 677 in all, under 14 years of age, of whom 7 boys and 6 girls are only 2 years of age.

The page of the petition and number of each male petitioner under 14 is given in Table 1, hereto attached, and of each female petitioner in Table 2, hereto attached.

There is strong reason to believe that the number of minors under 14 is much greater than that given above, by reason of the fact that several hundred fraudulent changes in the ages of petitioners is apparent on the face of the petition, particulars of which are hereinafter given.

The number above enumerated is simply that appearing on the face of the petition.

SECOND FACT TENDING TO DISCREDIT THE PETITION.

The ages of 53 of the male petitioners and 228 of the female petitioners, making 281 in all, have been fraudulently changed from a lower to a higher figure.

The object of these changes is manifestly to try and make the face of the petition comply with the statement contained therein that the minors are over 14, and second, to give an appearance of greater responsibility and weight to the petition than it would have if so many young children appeared to be signers.

The page of the petition and number of each male signature which has been fraudulently changed is given in Table 2, hereto attached.

The page of the petition and number of each female signature the age opposite which has been fraudulently changed is given in Table 3, hereto attached.

There are a great number of other ages which appear to have been tampered with, but only these are enumerated above which have plainly been fraudulently changed.

THIRD FACT TENDING TO DISCREDIT THE PETITION.

The signatures of over 1,400, or nearly 10 per cent, of the adult petitioners are not original, but forgeries.

There are an immense number of other signatures that appear to be forgeries, but only those plainly appearing to be so are enumerated above.

The pages of the petition and numbers of each of the signatures which are not original are enumerated, as to the male signatures in Table 4 and as to the female signatures in Table 5, hereto attached.

The following are some of the most glaring instances of wholesale incorporation of signatures, all in one handwriting.

On page 95 of the male petition 19 signatures, Nos. 23 to 40, are all in the same handwriting.

On page 161 of the male petition 18 signatures, Nos. 33 to 50, are all in the same handwriting.

On page 163 of the male petition 7 signatures, Nos. 9 to 15, are in one handwriting; 9 signatures, Nos. 17 to 25, are in one handwriting, and 14 signatures, Nos. 26 to 45, are in one handwriting.

On page 164 of the male petition 46 signatures, Nos. 5 to 50, are all in one handwriting.

On page 165 of the male petition 20 signatures, Nos. 30 to 49, are in the same handwriting.

On page 212 of the male petition 20 signatures, Nos. 20 to 43, are in the same handwriting.

On page 255 of the male petition 12 signatures, all there are on the page, are in the handwriting of Edward K. Lilikalan.

All of the signatures on page 8 of the women's petition, 16 in number, are also in this man's handwriting.

On page 77 of the women's petition 16 signatures, Nos. 34 to 49, are in the same handwriting (not Lilikalan's, but a number of the names signed by Lilikalan on page 8 are written again by some one else on page 77).

A strong side light is thrown upon the petition as a whole by the fact that Lilikalan is an intimate personal adherent of the late reigning family, a prominent officeholder, and member of the legislature under the monarchy, and is now an implacable Royalist and advocate of restoration of the monarchy.

In addition to signing his own and all the other names on the two pages above indicated, he attests his enthusiasm by again signing his own name on pages 55 and 255 of the male petition. I am personally and intimately acquainted with Lilikalan's handwriting. Mr. John Ross also signs his name on page 307, and again on page 308.

On page 200 of the male petition 25 signatures, Nos. 3 to 27, are in the same handwriting.

On page 204 of the male petition 23 signatures, Nos. 2 to 24, are in the same handwriting.

On page 5 of the female petition all the 43 signatures and the ages are in the same handwriting.

On page 8 of the women's petition all of the 16 signatures are in the same handwriting.

On page 12 of the women's petition 44 of the 43 signatures are in the same handwriting.

All the signatures on pages 108, 109, and 111 of the women's petition, 125 in all, are in the same handwriting.

All of the signatures (except 13 on page 120) on pages 116, 120, 121, and 122 of the female petition, 173 in all, are in the same handwriting.

On page 340 of the women's petition C. K. Pa, a man, has signed all the names from Nos. 6 to 30, 31 in all. His own signature appears as No. 1 on page 130 of the men's petition. All the numbering of signatures on pages 130, 131, and 132 of the men's petition is in his handwriting.

The pages of the petition and numbers of the signatures of male petitioners which do not appear to be original signatures are given in Table No. 4, and of females in Table No. 5, hereto attached.

FOURTH FACT TENDING TO DISCREDIT THE PETITION.

The petition purports to give the ages of the petitioners.

The ages on whole pages of the petition are filled in all in the same handwriting, and manifestly without attempt on the part of the enumerator to insert the real age of the petitioners, the ages all ending in even or round numbers.

The following examples will suffice to demonstrate that no reliance can be placed on the correctness of the ages given:

On page 73 of the male petition signatures Nos. 30 to 49, inclusive, have set opposite them, all in one handwriting, the following as their respective ages: 30, 30, 30, 35, 43, 42, 45, 40, 20, 48, 45, 42, 30, 40, 60, 30, 25, 30, 40, 60 years.

On page 78 the ages set opposite signatures Nos. 9 to 22, inclusive, all in the same handwriting, are 45, 40, 20, 30, 40, 25, 40, 45, 30, 50, 55, 40, 60, 45 years.

There are scores of other instances of ages all in one handwriting, manifestly inserted by a different person and at a different time from the signatures.

Again, the ages of 273 certainly, and probably many more, petitioners have been fraudulently changed. The ages of petitioners are not ordinarily an essential part of a petition, but having in this case been made a part, frauds in connection affect the bona fides of the whole petition.

FIFTH FACT TENDING TO DISCREDIT THE PETITION.

Each and every page of the male petition is countersigned with the original signatures of Enoch Johnson, secretary, and James K. Kaula, president of the "Hawaiian Patriotic League," and each page of the female petition is countersigned with the original signatures of Mrs. Lilia Aholo, secretary, and Mrs. K. Campbell, president of the "Women's Hawaiian Patriotic League."

These four people are all intelligent. Johnson and Kaula are members of the bar of the supreme court of Hawaii. Kaula is now chairman of the royalist delegation in Washington, and personally brought the petition from Honolulu.

There is no possibility that the officers of the organizations named did not know of the frauds and forgeries enumerated above, and yet they have certified to the correctness and genuineness of each individual page, and have even taken oath before a notary public certifying thereto, and secured the certificate of the United States consul as to the official standing of the notary.

SUMMARY OF FACTS INCONSISTENT WITH JOHNSON'S AND KAULIA'S CERTIFICATES OF GENUINENESS OF PETITION.

A summary of the facts which appear upon the face of the male petition inconsistent with its genuineness and bona fides, which must have been known to Kaula and Johnson when they certified it, are as follows:

1. The petition certifies that the minor petitioners are between 14 and 20 years of age.

The male petition shows on its face that out of a total of 308 pages, 105 pages, or more than one-third, contain the names of 350 minors, ranging from 2 to 13 years of age.

2. That on 31 pages of the male petition the ages of 53 petitioners who are under 14 have been fraudulently changed to 14 or upward.

3. That on 18 pages 23 persons have signed 203 signatures, as high as 46 signatures on 1 page being in the same handwriting (page 164, male petition).

4. In a great number of instances the ages are all in the same handwriting and in round numbers only.

5. The signatures of the boys, 2 and 3 years of age, are in good round handwriting. This may be claimed as evidence of the advanced educational system of Hawaii.

Each and every page above indicated is countersigned by Johnson and Kaula.

SUMMARY OF FACTS INCONSISTENT WITH MRS. AHOLO'S AND MRS. CAMPBELL'S CERTIFICATE OF GENUINENESS OF PETITION.

1. The female petition shows on its face that 327 of the minors are under 14 years of age.

2. There is no separate certificate on the female petition that minors are over 14, but the common management of the two petitions is evidenced by the fact that on 73 pages of the female petition the ages of 228 petitioners who are under 14 have been fraudulently changed to 14 or upward.

3. On 42 pages 43 persons have signed 1,104 names, as high as 126 signatures in one case and 178 in another being all in the same handwriting; and in one instance 16 female names (page 8) and in another 31 (page 240) are in the handwritings of well-known men.

4. In a great number of instances the ages are all in the same handwriting and in round numbers.

5. The signatures of the 2 and 3 year old girls are in good round handwriting, impossible to be genuine.

Each and every page indicated above is countersigned by Mrs. Aholo and Mrs. Campbell.

In conclusion, I desire to make some explanation concerning the getting up and signing of petitions in Hawaii.

It is common knowledge there that even to a greater degree than in this country there is little feeling of responsibility attached to signing a petition.

Among the native Hawaiians especially the feeling is that it is rather an honor to see one's name attached to a petition, and that it would be unfriendly to refuse to sign a petition, an act which costs nothing.

For example, the petition in question was, I am credibly informed, taken to many prominent supporters of annexation and they were requested to sign it simply to show that there was no hard feeling in the matter.

Subscription papers were also passed around to raise money to send the royalist delegation now in Washington, and leading annexationists asked to subscribe thereto.

As an example of the irresponsible signing of petitions which has come to my personal knowledge, I was a member of the Hawaiian legislature in 1886, and noticing a native member sitting at my side, writing at the top of a document which contained a number of signatures, I asked him what he was doing.

He replied that he was preparing a petition in support of a bill which he had introduced.

I said, "Why, you don't mean to say that you get your petition signed first, and write in the heading afterwards, do you?"

"Why, certainly I do," he replied. "It's too much bother to send clear to my district to get a petition, so I had a lot of blank sheets signed up in advance, and every time I want a petition to back up one of my measures, I write in a heading on one of these sheets." He thereupon pulled open the drawer of his desk and showed me some twenty or thirty sheets all signed in blank, with a space at the top in which to insert the object of the petition.

Another member of the Hawaiian Legislature once made a wager that within a given time he could secure a hundred signatures to a petition praying the Legislature to make an appropriation to move one of the islands so that it would be nearer to headquarters and easier to get at. He got the signatures within the time named.

Dated Washington, March 4, 1898.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I now yield the remainder of my time to the chairman of the committee [Mr. HITT].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make my acknowledgment, in the first place, to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY], who occupies a different position on this measure from the one I advocate, and to other gentlemen on our side of the House who have kindly given me a portion of their time. I feel that I am indebted especially to the gentleman from Kentucky because of the fact that he and I differ upon the pending question.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition to annex the Sandwich Islands to the United States, with or without the consent of their population, meets with my unqualified and unalterable opposition. I am also opposed to the permanent conquest and acquisition of Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and all other isles of the sea. Nations have always acted, and should govern themselves at all times, upon principles entirely different from those which actuate individuals. I admit that individuals do, and should oftentimes, act for the good of others regardless to a greater or lesser extent of the result of their action on themselves. But this is not true of nations.

Governments must base their action upon purely selfish considerations. In looking at the question of the annexation of Hawaii, or of any foreign territory, the only question that should enter into consideration by us is the one question: Is it best for the United States? The weal or woe, the misery or happiness, the poverty or prosperity of the foreigner or those to be annexed is not involved, and not to be considered in making up our minds as to the annexation of foreign territory.

I am so devout and devoted a lover of my own country that I admit without a moment's hesitation that there is no territory remote from or lying near by us that would not be better off in most if not all its conditions by annexation to and by becoming amalgamated with ours. The superiority of our institutions and the excellence of our form of government, which to my mind is the world's ideal, place this matter beyond peradventure or dispute.

The chief question, then, involved in the resolution before us to decide is, Shall we for our own benefit annex the Sandwich Islands? The laboring oar in this contention and in the effort to answer this interrogatory in the affirmative is upon those who favor the passage of the pending measure. The procedure or plan of annexation is of doubtful constitutionality and involves fundamental principles. The annexation of Hawaii and the acquisition of far-away colonies involves a permanent policy that is far-reaching and of paramount importance to this Republic. It is, in my judgment, in palpable violation of all our traditions and our past conduct.

We have not only not heretofore entered upon a policy of the acquisition of foreign territory and of outlying colonies from which we are separated by seas and oceans, but, on the contrary, we have persistently and uniformly maintained a different policy. We have been demonstrative and aggressive in the pursuit of our policy. At the very outset of our existence as a nation the greatest of our great and the wisest of our wise men earnestly and eloquently advocated the policy we have pursued. The policy of this Government in respect to this matter, and indeed of all foreign questions, was laid down in the beginning by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, each of whom, in terms which can not be misunderstood, warned us of the dangers of foreign complications, of entangling alliances with other nations, and of annexing territory beyond the sea.

For more than a century the policy so firmly established by these great men has been pursued with unbroken harmony, has proved a bulwark of strength to our own people, and at the same time has won for us the respect and admiration of the world. For one I shall not violate this policy and advocate another which to my mind is so un-American, unwise, and fraught with so much danger to the Republic. I will not make a complete departure from the safe course we have followed so long and so profitably.

I am opposed to the new policy provided in the pending measure because it is plainly in contravention of the Monroe doctrine. We can not as an enlightened people say to all the nations of the earth, "You shall not extend your possessions on this hemisphere," and at the same time reach out ourselves for lands and colonies in theirs.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question right here, because he is conversant with the Monroe doctrine. Does he say that the Monroe doctrine prohibits us from taking as a part of our country an island 2,000 miles from our shores and 4,000 miles from the nearest point of the Eastern Continent? Might not that island be more properly the property of the United States than of any country that lies beyond the seas?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it not in the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not understand that the fact that Hawaii may be nearer to us than to any other country will interfere with or prevent the application of the Monroe doctrine. That doctrine in essence and spirit forbids our going out into the sea and the ocean to acquire territory.

Mr. TAWNEY. Did we not do that in the Alaska purchase?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will come to that in a moment. The case which the gentleman mentions is not parallel with this.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have we not done it in the case of fifty-seven islands which we have annexed, exclusive of the Aleutian Islands?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think not. Though separated in some degree, like the Florida reefs from Florida or the Aleutian Islands from Alaska, they are part and parcel of the territory annexed; and if we have annexed others of a different character it has been for mere coaling stations, or something of that kind.

Mr. TAWNEY. The fifty-seven islands that I referred to are exclusive of the Aleutian Islands and in no way connected with the Alaska purchase.

Mr. RICHARDSON. They have not been annexed in the sense in which we propose to annex Hawaii. I will come to that point, I think, a little further on.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Island of Midway, a part of the Hawaiian group, is certainly an analogous case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If we are to demand of other nations that they keep their hands off American colonies and not intermeddle with American affairs, it certainly behooves us, nay, it is imperatively required of us, to set them the example by refraining from intermeddling with the affairs of Europe, in the Orient, and elsewhere. I am a firm believer in the Monroe doctrine in all its force and consequences. I would not modify it at all, and for this reason I would not invite its violation in letter or spirit by other nations by our attempting the conquest of territory beyond the seas.

If I believed or could be convinced that such conquest and acquisition were essential to our longer existence as a free and independent people, I might hold a different opinion. If I believed that such a course contributed even remotely to our happiness and prosperity, I might entertain the abandonment of the views I am expressing. But, sir, a departure from the course we have pursued under the guidance and inspiration of the fathers is not demanded for our happiness as a people, and, in my judgment, instead of bringing increased prosperity and blessings to our country, will entail upon us decay and disaster, and finally dissolution and death. I know it is claimed, in the consideration of this measure to annex Hawaii, that the acquisition of Cuba, the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and other colonies is not necessarily involved and should not be taken into consideration. If gentlemen are honest and sincere in this contention, they will not hesitate to support an amendment to the measure annexing Hawaii which I shall offer at the proper time, if no other gentleman does, declaring that a colonial policy is not to be entered upon and that acquisitions are to stop with Hawaii.

But, sir, this measure is but the forerunner of others. It is the beginning of a new policy on our part. The boldest, if not the discreetest, of its advocates admit this. If the question stood by itself and did not involve other conquests or acquisitions, I should oppose it then as unwise. It is claimed that the annexation of Hawaii would strengthen the strategic position of the United States by giving us a great naval advantage; that, is the command of the eastern Pacific Ocean, thereby protecting our western coast. This contention must fail, as all will admit who listened attentively to the able argument of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] on this point. But supposing this were admitted in a partial sense; what protection do we need that the possession of Hawaii would afford?

In our present condition we do not need any such protection. It is only after we shall have entered upon the policy of conquest and annexation of outlying colonies that it can be truly said we need such protection. I concede if we are to change our policy and enter upon that of colony and land grabbing as a nation, then we should need Hawaii and other remote islands and colonies. The acquisition of one creates at once the demand and a necessity which becomes urgent for others. When we start out on this new policy, we can not stop with the acquisition of one, but must go on until we absorb all.

Let us enter upon such a policy and get our appetite once whetted in that direction, there will be no way of satisfying that appetite until all the isles of the sea have been engulfed by us. Then our foreign complications will multiply beyond computation and war will ensue. Indeed we should not emerge from one war before we would be plunged into another, until our Republic, which has hitherto loved peace and the ways thereof, will become the bully of the world and the despised of all peoples.

I do not mean to disparage or put in question our ability to fight successfully all the world if they only come to our shores and fight us upon our chosen ground. We might do this by reason of our inexhaustible resources, indomitable courage, and unfaltering patriotism. But why provoke such a stupendous controversy? Can it be supposed that we can with one breath forbid all other nations (many of them of great power and fighting ability) to enter upon this hemisphere for any purpose whatever, and at once ourselves enter upon the conquest or acquisition of or even interference with provinces in the Eastern Hemisphere or elsewhere? The position of this Republic has always been that of concentration and not diffusion.

Our policy has been to foster and build up the nation as a land power in contradistinction to sea power. Our position among nations is unique. No reason exists for a change in our policy. By its pursuit we have won and have held the esteem and the admiration of the world. We should not be beguiled now by the glamour of conquest or the excitement of the hour engendered in a large degree by a recent great naval victory in a distant sea to abandon our well-chosen position. So long as we pursue the policies of the fathers and founders of the Republic and adhere to the practices of the hundred years of the past which they bequeathed to us, and which have brought us unparalleled prosperity and unalloyed happiness, we need no protection for the Pacific coast other than that which God has given us.

Our position on our western coast and as a nation at large is exceptionally strong. We have no insular territories to defend. All our possessions are on our own continent, and, with the exception of Alaska, all is continuous land territory. No navy of the world nor the combined navies of all nations can cut us off from our possessions. Our vast area and limits, with our opportunities for defense, stand as impassable barriers to invasions from any part of our coast.

Washington, in discussing our relations with foreign countries and reviewing subjects closely akin to the one involved in the pending resolution in his Farewell Address to the people of the United States, uttered words which I shall presently quote of unsurpassed wisdom. I would rejoice to-day if they could be read and understood in all their force, power, and beauty by all of our people everywhere. The following are his words:

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient Government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

Again Mr. Jefferson taught us that the true doctrine was and is:

Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether if we should acquire these islands it will not necessitate our building and continuing to build a larger navy.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; I will come to that point directly.

Mr. Speaker, President Washington, it seems to me, could see as if with the natural eye our present situation.

Sir, we want no islands away out in the sea which can in a few days at any stage of our existence become the prey of hostile navies. The other great powers of the world, England, France, Germany, Italy, and Spain, indeed, all the great nations, except, possibly, Russia, have such colonies and islands to defend; and while no one can truthfully say that the United States could not successfully defend them, if she had them, it is the un wisdom of the policy of seizing and annexing them I am attempting to demonstrate.

I am opposed to the new policy for another reason. It involves the building of a mighty navy and the maintenance of a standing army at all times of stupendous proportions and magnitude. These two things will be absolutely necessary for the respectable enforcement of the new order of things. Why should we incur the enormous expense of a great navy for the Atlantic Ocean, another for the Gulf of Mexico, and a third for the Pacific Ocean? A corresponding increase will be required for a standing army.

Mr. Speaker, we have had enough of war and of the expenditures incident thereto. As a nation we are now, year by year, and every year, paying a tribute to war of $150,000,000 in the form of pensions alone. I fail to see in the near future any hope for a reduction on this account. On the other hand, the war with Spain in which we are engaged is to add how much no one can tell to our pension roll. In addition to this immense sum, we are also paying as a further annual tribute in the shape of interest on our public debt about $35,000,000 and to a sinking fund for its retirement the further sum of about $51,000,000.

Why, then, should we incur the additional expenses for great armies and navies? They serve to provoke war sometimes when without them war could be avoided with honor. Enter upon the new policy I am discussing and add to our present enormous expenses the still greater and more oppressive expenditures incident thereto, and we will lay excessive burdens on our people which will be without a parallel in their history. For one, representing a constituency as proud, patriotic, and intelligent as any represented on this floor, I will not give my voice and vote to any measure or policy which in my judgment will create the necessity and lay the foundations for the fearful and extravagant expenditures to which I have referred. No nation prior to this period has sought or desired a conflict of arms with the United States.

If nations act upon the principle I mentioned at the outset of my remarks—that is, that they govern themselves in their course and conduct toward other nations upon selfish grounds—why should they desire war with us? What could any nation gain by such a conflict of arms? All great powers realize that they have more to lose than to gain by war with us. Then let us not provoke them to attack us, but go on for all ages to come, growing in prosperity as the years and decades and even centuries go by, adding each year to the sum of human happiness by giving our people the freest, the best, and most prosperous Government on the globe.

The other great nations I have mentioned have their outlying colonies, and must maintain their powerful armies and navies, for the support of which excessive burdens in the shape of taxes are annually laid upon their people. Let us not grind the faces of our people by exorbitant taxation and make ourselves weak by enforcing a policy of colonial possessions.

Gentlemen in their stress for plausible arguments upon which to place their advocacy of the annexation policy they now favor have referred to the former acquisitions of territory by our beloved country. They cite the Louisiana purchase by Jefferson, and the annexation of Texas, with the acquisitions of the Californias, and so forth, by Polk, and of the Floridas by Monroe. These, sir, are not parallel cases to the proposition we are now discussing. If Hawaii or the Philippines touched California, or Cuba touched Florida, there might be plausibility in such arguments and comparisons. The former acquisitions by us of territory meant no change in our land or sea policy, no increase of our Army or Navy, no abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, and no entangling alliances with foreign peoples and courts.

These acquisitions were almost or quite essential to our existence as a republic. It is shocking to compare the annexation of Hawaii with the acquisition of the Louisiana territory alone, to say nothing of Texas and the Californias. I resent the comparison as one totally unworthy to be made. Mr. Blaine, in his great book, speaking of the acquisition of the Louisiana territory by Mr. Jefferson, said:

It brought incalculable wealth, power, and prestige to the Union, and must always be regarded as the master stroke of policy which advanced the United States from a comparatively feeble nation lying between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mississippi River to a continental power of assured strength and boundless promise.

Mr. Speaker, this was the largest conquest of territory ever achieved without war. The cost was only about $15,000,000, a sum which does not equal the revenue which is collected by the Government on its soil in a single month. The territory thus acquired was then, much of it—

A solitude of vast extent, untouched
By hand or art, where nature sowed herself
And reaped her crops.

This territory to-day comprises the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, North and South Dakota, Wyoming, and Montana, nearly all of Minnesota, a portion of Colorado, and the Indian Territory. Reasonable and fair-minded men should not cite this as a precedent for the annexation of Hawaii. Let us look for a moment from that picture to the other. What do we get when we annex Hawaii? According to the census of 1896 the population of these islands consisted of the following elements (omitting some of the smallest):

Population.	Number.	Population.	Number.
Hawaiians (pure and mixed)	89,504	Americans	3,080
Japanese	25,407	British	2,250
Chinese	21,616	Germans	1,432
Portuguese	15,291

It will be seen that in a population of about 109,000 only 3,080 are Americans, 2,250 British, and 1,432 Germans, the remainder, about fifteen-sixteenths, or nearly 16 to 1, being Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese, and natives of the Sandwich Islands, wholly unfit for free representative or local self-government.

The advocates of the annexation of Hawaii have not told us what we shall do with it after we get it. That is to say, they do not agree in their conclusions on this point. The able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. HITT, failed and refused to tell us, when pointedly asked to do so, in his opening speech. He frankly admitted he did not know. Is it to become a State of the American Union? Heaven forbid! Two Senators in the other body and one Representative upon this floor from the free and sovereign State of Hawaii! Three more votes in the electoral college, enough sometimes to settle the Presidency! May we be spared such a travesty on our politics and institutions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to remind him that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], one of the most zealous advocates of annexation, said a few moments ago in the course of some very carefully prepared remarks: "I scorn to discuss what is to come from this annexation." That is the kind of statesmanship we are invited to follow—a statesmanship that does not see an inch ahead of its nose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true.

If it is not to become a State, what then shall we do with it? Shall it be held permanently as a Territory? Will it be contended that the inhabitants of those islands can govern themselves by and through a Territorial legislature? No one will make such a claim.

Mr. BERRY. The gentleman will allow me to remind him that the treaty with reference to annexation provides that there shall be three commissioners representing this country and two representing the Hawaiian Islands, who shall recommend measures to be passed upon by the Congress of the United States for the future government of the territory which we acquire. It is possible that in these two bodies there might be found wisdom enough to govern these islands.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman has anticipated a point to which I will come in a moment. We know that the attitude of a Territory with us has always been one of expectation and hope. Expectation and hope that it would soon be permitted to take upon itself the form, conditions, and responsibilities of a proud and equal State in the American Union. There is no reasonable hope that by time or circumstance the conditions in Hawaii will so radically and materially change and improve as to render the inhabitants thereof qualified to become citizens of a sovereign State.

A hot sun, the tropical climate, the rough, barren, mountainous lands of a large portion of the islands, not to enlarge upon the fatal plague which unhappily afflicts them, all forbid their general occupation and tillage by our people. It seems to me they must inevitably remain the heritage of the Sandwich Islander, the Asiatic races, and half-breeds who can never approach to our American civilization nor partake of nor participate in our American institutions.

The only form of government then left for them would be a board or commission of some kind, appointed by the President of the United States to manage and control the affairs of the islands. These boards would vary and change as Administrations come and go with us. They would not be permanent, and, if they were, would be utterly and entirely in contravention of our laws and institutions, which are rooted and grounded on the principles of equality and self-government.

I oppose annexation again in the interest of labor and the laboring classes of our people. We have been enacting immigration laws for the protection of our homes. Congress has exhausted its resources in the efforts to pass wise measures prohibiting certain classes by reason of their poverty, their ignorance, or diseased conditions from entering our ports and coming in competition with our laborers and demoralizing our people. By the proposed measure we annex the very classes we have sought to exclude by legislation from our shores.

It is the supremest folly in Congress to formulate legislative anathemas against undesirable immigration from Europe and close the Pacific coast, and, indeed, all ways of ingress to our country, to the Chinese, and then in one act admit nearly 80,000 Chinese, Japanese, and Hawaiians to become a part of our population. We will probably by this act admit more Chinese than San Francisco now contains, besides many other obnoxious and objectionable foreigners.

Mr. BERRY. Permit me to say that the treaty which we have been negotiating provides that no citizen of China and no native of the islands shall by reason of annexation become a citizen of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We are not considering their citizenship, but their presence.

Mr. BERRY. But the gentleman from Tennessee is arguing that they are to be admitted as citizens.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman from Kentucky say that any treaty with those people is above the Constitution?

Mr. BERRY. You have now laws upon your statute books prohibiting Chinamen from becoming citizens of this country, and that provision is only reasserted in the constitution of that country.

Mr. BLAND. The constitution makes every native of that island a citizen.

Mr. BERRY. Yes, but you have done away with that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The trouble is that we undertake to annex to our country and make a part of it a population that can not come among us and be a part of us; and that is really inconsistent with the idea of our Government under our Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, in this connection I desire to say, in my opinion, it is monstrous to contemplate the evil effects upon the laboring people of our land and upon the American farmer if this Government embarks upon the plan of imperial colonization.

The cheap cool labor of the tropical colonies we would acquire, directed and managed by competent hands, and their products manipulated by world-wide trusts would close up all our sugar industries, both of cane and beets, destroy our tobacco growing and tobacco manufacture, and so cheapen our Southern products of cotton, rice, hemp, and all fiber crops, by the competition and increased production in the East and West Indies, and other tropical colonies as to forever destroy these industries in the United States. We have been forced to endure prices below the cost of the production of nearly all of these commodities for years past under a high protective tariff system, but these former low prices would be prosperity itself as compared with those which would obtain under the new system.

It is contended by some persons that we must enter upon the policy of annexation in order to extend our commerce and to plant our flag in all harbors. In order to do this they say we must of necessity change our former course and conduct and must possess a powerful navy. I grant you it is desirable to widen our markets and extend our trade with other nations. They say, and truthfully, that commerce follows the flag. But let me ask, how are we to inaugurate and pursue this new policy successfully unless we abandon that old policy which its advocates proudly denominate the American policy, a policy which we have heretofore pursued and which is altogether at variance with the proposed new one?

It is all very well to talk of commerce following the flag and of sending our merchant ships abroad until their sails whiten every sea. This is a consummation devoutly to be wished. But I submit we can not hold fast to the policy of a high protective tariff and at the same time whiten every sea with the sails of our merchantmen. Commerce will never follow very enthusiastically the flag of that nation which hedges itself in as by a Chinese Wall with high protective tariff rates and schedules. We can not expect nations and peoples to come to us to buy when by law we forbid them to bring something to sell to us. And thus we find again that the friends and advocates of the new policy are confronted with another insurmountable obstacle.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, if it is along the line of what I am talking about.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not the gentleman think that the experience of this year, when our exports will exceed our imports by $600,000,000, disputes his proposition and disproves it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I do not think that at all. The gentleman is speaking of present conditions, while I am speaking of and attempting to depict the future condition which will be brought about by reason of the new policy, which I am attempting to show is unwise.

Mr. HEPBURN. The condition of a protective tariff exists now, and the exports this year exceed the imports by $600,000,000.

Mr. BERRY. That is on account of the exportation of wheat.

Mr. GAINES. Hungry Europe did that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be for some reason which I am not going to discuss now, but the conditions will materially change then, and if they are at all prosperous now, they will fail to be under the new policy which I am attempting to describe. Mr. Speaker, unless they can batter down and demolish the hitherto impregnable fortress of protection their contention in favor of annexation and an increase in our Navy, to the end that our commerce may be extended and our markets increased, must fail.

I heard a distinguished member of this House in a public speech a few days ago say we had already entered upon the new era, that our time-honored policy had been abandoned, and that henceforth we were to acquire and permanently hold colonies everywhere. This thought, too, was liberally applauded by his audience. Like the commercial firm in the well-known play of the "Gilded Fool," we are "to progress," we are "to reach out." I do not subscribe to this doctrine. I deny that that is to be our policy.

What, sir, was the first solemn declaration made by this Congress, and which was approved by the Chief Executive of the nation, when we entered upon the present war a little over thirty days gone by? In declaring war we announced openly to all the world a wholly different course of conduct. That policy we then avowed with emphasis and unanimity is contained in the resolution I now quote, and which forms a part of our solemn declaration as we took up arms and made our appeal to Him who controls the destiny of nations. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island (meaning the Island of Cuba) except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Mr. Speaker, many of us thought and undertook to teach our people that when our Government, speaking through its representatives, solemnly gave this pledge to all mankind we were honest and sincere; that when she drew her sword and unfurled her flag in this contest, it was to wage a holy war (if war can ever be holy) for humanity. It was not supposed it was to degenerate into a campaign of conquest or boodle.

During this entire controversy Spain, our adversary, through her statesmen and public journals, has persistently charged that the sole object of the war on our part was not humanity, but that we were bent on despoiling her of her territory. We have denied it. Shall we by our own action now or hereafter prove that her allegations were true and that our own were false? If we are to be justified at all before the world for our part in this terrible war, for all war is terrible, let us not take advantage of the situation to add one foot of territory to our now already ample domain.

Let us demonstrate not only to Spain but to all the world that the people of the United States had but one object and purpose in this great controversy, and that was and is to see that justice is done even though the heavens fall. Let Cuba be made free and Spain removed with all her medieval cruelties and atrocious crimes from this hemisphere, and then the only purpose we have or can have in this war will have been accomplished.

Mr. Frederic R. Coudert, who is a recognized authority on international questions, was asked his views on the subject I am discussing, a few days ago. I take the liberty of quoting here what he said, for he expresses the opinion of many thinking men in our country. He said:

In a very few words I can tell you what, in my opinion, the United States should do with the Philippine Islands—

In the first place, Rear-Admiral Dewey should blow up the fortifications, turn the islands over to the insurgents, and then sail with his fleet for home. The insurgents are the ones to settle all questions as to the future government of the archipelago, and we should put them in a position to do so, and then leave them alone.

We started to accomplish one single, declared, definite object, a most noble one, based purely on humanitarian grounds. Our sincerity in our philanthropic professions is the only possible excuse for the war. To maintain good faith and our reputation with the rest of the world is worth a dozen Philippines and millions of coolies, Chinamen, and Malays.

We may count upon the sympathy of Europe so long as we adhere to our programme as deliberately set forth to the entire world. We can only depend upon jealousy and distrust if we depart from it. We told Spain she must leave Cuba. The war was entered upon to drive her from the island. That was our declared object, and we should do all that is properly necessary under the laws of war for the purpose without departure from that object.

I quote the following from the American Agriculturist:

The policy of colonial expansion, now so extravagantly urged in interested quarters, may not at present contemplate interference in European politics, but such interference would be less a departure from the new policy than this policy is a departure from the Monroe doctrine. The new idea sounds very grand at first, and in the flush of victory the appeal to extend our domination beyond the seas is so alluring that the consequences of such action are lost sight of.

The policy of colonial empire would at once expose us to embroilment with other nations. It would vastly magnify the power and expense of Army and Navy. It would perpetuate increased taxes. It would inaugurate an era of corruption in our foreign possessions, a debasement of the blood, that could not fail to in time affect the physical and mental stamina of our people at home. It would be un-American, unwise, unconstitutional, and in results unworthy of the effort.

On still higher ground a colonial policy is objectionable. It would degenerate the holiest war ever waged for humanity into a campaign of conquest. This would lower the United States before the world, but its moral effect upon our own people would be still worse.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] in his opening remarks quoted Hon. John Sherman, as he gave his opinion in his great book a few years since, as to the conquest or acquisition of foreign territory. He showed that Mr. Sherman in his palmy days opposed such a policy. I now quote here from a recent interview with him published in the St. Louis Republic of May 29. This interview shows he is still opposed to conquest of territory. On the subject of the war he was asked:

"Will it become a war of conquest?" He replied:

"Certainly not. We want neither the Philippines nor Cuba. We want no foreign outposts which we will have to defend with our ships. We do not want to be constantly in trouble with France, Germany, and possibly England. This is a self-contained nation. It has limitless resources in itself. It wants no entanglements with foreign nations. It wants to keep them off its shores and it wants to keep off theirs. Our trade treaties with every civilized nation on the globe are sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, I could quote other eminent authorities, but time and space will not permit.

There may be something alluring in a policy of annexation and conquest of territory. An individual naturally feels as if he were adding riches and wealth to himself when he acquires lands and tenements. This is true of a nation under some circumstances. There are no colonies or possessions open to us, however, the acquisition of which would add to our wealth. We should not then demoralize our people by a departure from our uniform course of action for more than a century and that which I have just shown was our avowed policy at the outset of our impending war with Spain.

If we "reach out," as we are advised by some to do, and expand our policies and rule of action, we will assuredly neglect our domestic interests. Our Army and Navy will be increased, our foreign policy will be developed, our interest in other nations will be enhanced, but our home interests, which vitally concern and deeply affect all our home people, will be neglected or abandoned. Let us give more careful and serious attention to our internal affairs and foster and develop our home concerns.

Let us strive to give our people better educational opportunities, a better banking system, more mail facilities, free deliveries and cheaper postage, better roads, improved waterways, better protection against monopolies, better laws to control corporate greed and extortion, better laws for the regulation of trusts, better laws for the distribution of the currency, and impose lighter burdens of taxation upon the country, and, in short, the reform of all existing abuses. We do not want the enemies of social progress and of good government to hold high carnival at home while National and State legislatures are entirely engrossed concerning themselves with our newly acquired wards, many of them much "off in color," in far-away colonies, and with our business relations with foreign nations.

Again, Mr. Speaker, if the era of territorial pelf and pillage has begun with us as a nation, and we are to start out for more territory and greater landed possessions, we should not begin the attack upon a poor, weak, and half-civilized nation, such as Spain. As a brave, courageous, and self-respecting people, we should commence this warfare with some government that ranks in the first class in the family of nations. For our country to seize the colonies of Spain for permanent use and occupation would place us on a par in our action with that of the giant who robs a dwarf or a big boy among school children despoiling the small boy of his favorite marbles.

As a brave and powerful people, if we are really in need of other lands and must have them, we should either buy them and pay for them or should say to Great Britain, "You must withdraw from this continent." Why not say to her that we need Canada and intend to have that country? This would be the manly thing to do and would give us contiguous territory of great value and resources. If a change of policy is determined upon and we must of necessity rob somebody, why not attack Great Britain, a member of our class, and proceed to take that which is valuable and worth possessing? Do not despoil the weak by seizing that which is worthless, and degrade and dishonor ourselves in the act.

Mr. Speaker, as I am about to close, allow me to sum up briefly something of what the new policy means:

1. It means the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, a doctrine which is the guiding star of the Western Hemisphere, and next to the Constitution itself has been the greatest blessing to our land.
2. It means the abandonment of economy and simple government, which Jefferson, the father of Democracy, said was a landmark thereof.
3. It means immense standing armies and powerful navies.
4. It means the admission of undesirable foreigners into our midst to corrupt our body politic and impair true American institutions.
5. It means the magnifying of the National Government and national power, as against local and State authority. It is centralization itself.
6. It means colonies abroad of foreign tongues and nationalities ruled by military satraps instead of self-governing States in harmony with republican institutions.
7. It means the neglect and consequent decay of our local home governments and domestic concerns, the bulwarks of our strength and glory in the past.
8. It means odious entangling alliances with other nations.
9. It means wars on land and wars on the sea.
10. It means the downfall of the protective system and the first step in the march toward free trade.
11. It means a very large falling off in revenues from tariff duties and a correspondingly large increase in internal taxes, which so much impoverish the country and vex the taxpayer.
12. It means the destruction of the American farmer, that happy and independent class who have always been the peculiar pride of our beloved and favored land.

These are some of the things which will inevitably follow the new policy.

Mr. Speaker, we need no additional territory. Our domain is now ample and sufficient. We have an area exclusive of Alaska of 3,025,600 square miles, and including Alaska of 3,557,000 square miles. We have existed as a Republic something over one hundred years. Our development has been marvelous and our prosperity unprecedented. We have now a population of 70,000,000 of people and can easily accommodate 500,000,000.

We have a climate varied and temperate, in which flourish abundant crops of all the cereals, as well as the tropical fruits; broad acres which in fertility rival those of the famed banks of the Nile; mineral resources comprising in part gold, silver, iron, coal, lead, copper, zinc, etc., which are inexhaustible in supply; railroads, telegraph, telephone, and all other improvements which annihilate time and space, unequaled by any; the grandest lakes and the mightiest rivers; a civilization which is unsurpassed; and have more newspapers and better ones to disseminate the news and elevate public thought; more churches in which to worship the true and living God; more manufactories in which are produced more than three-fifths of the manufactured products of the world; more schoolhouses in which the youth of our land is educated and trained for life's battles; more happy homes, and, in short, in every conceivable fashion we have more to bless our lands and people than any nation on this globe.

Let us, then, be content with that which we have. We should hold fast to the old and good, and strive not for the new and the bad. And supremest and above all else, our people North, South, East, and West, from ocean to ocean and from the pines of the North to the magnolias of the South, are once more lovingly united. All sectional animosities have been dissipated, a new era of peace and good will among men has been inaugurated—

And all the clouds that lower'd upon our house,
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

Henceforth and forever we are to be one people—one in mind, one in sentiment, one in patriotic endeavor, one in our hopes and aspirations, one in all that make a nation great, one in all that make a free people contented, prosperous, and happy.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, this nation needs the Hawaiian Islands for the benefit of its commerce in peace and its protection in war. It is a fact conceded by everybody that for commerce between the western shores of this continent and Asia there must be some intermediate land for a coaling station for ships engaged in commerce. The Hawaiian Islands hold such a position, being for all practical purposes about midway between the two continents, with a land-locked harbor unsurpassed in size and safety. To secure the possession of this harbor for the future against all contingencies the sovereignty of the islands is necessary, for whoever owns the islands owns the harbor. All treaties whatsoever would fall with a change of ownership.

It is claimed by the opponents of annexation that there is another route of equal commercial advantage and less in distance from continent to continent by the way of Unalaska. It is a route discovered in the argument of this question and not heretofore discovered by commerce. I venture the assertion that few, if any, vessels in trade between the American and Asiatic continents ever yet sailed on this route from San Francisco to any port in Asia, unless it was one in the Arctic seas.

When presented in this debate, it reminded me of the chap in New York who surprised the stockbrokers for a short time with a declaration that he had found a railroad route between New York and Chicago 250 miles shorter than any existing one, or any other that could be constructed, and he could prove it by his map. When the map was produced, there was a heavy red straight line drawn from New York to Chicago, which crossed the Alleghany Mountains at the highest summit in the range. And this was his shortest route. The map was correct, but the capital to build the railroad was not in sight.

Lines drawn on the map of a wide ocean representing the channels of commerce are very well if commerce follows such lines. But if it does not, reasons why it might do so are of little consequence. If the reasons urged against annexation now had prevailed while the purchase of Alaska was pending, we should not have this new logical route at all, for Alaska itself would still be Russian territory. There never has been any acquisition of territory without more or less opposition at the time of the acquisition, and the reasons were very much the same as those now offered—unconstitutional and dangerous to the liberties of the country.

I will not take the time of the House in discussing any constitutional question relative to the acquisition of territory by this Government. Mr. Jefferson said in 1803 that there was no grant of power in the Constitution for such acquisition; yet, beginning with his Administration, we have acquired foreign territory in area more than three times as great as that claimed by the original thirteen colonies or which the Government owned at the time of the adoption of our present Constitution.

For almost a century, beginning with Jefferson, the nation has been acquiring territory by treaty and by joint resolution and under Administrations of different political parties. If anything can be settled by the uniform practice of the Government, the power to acquire territory ought to be settled by this uniform, unbroken practice for almost a century, sustained by every branch of the Government and ratified universally by the people.

I am content to follow this uniform, unbroken practice in the exercise of a power that must certainly rest somewhere in the Government, or it could not have been thus sustained by all departments of the Government for this long period.

This question is not a law to be construed; it is a power of government to be exercised. And by that exercise in the past and by that alone the nation has in this first hundred years of its existence been enabled to expand from thirteen feeble colonies, hemmed in by the Atlantic Ocean in front, the Mississippi River in the rear, and Spanish and French dominion on the south, to forty-five independent Commonwealths, spanning a whole continent from ocean to ocean and extending through almost every zone.

For the exercise of this power to acquire territory it only needs a clear, unequivocal commercial necessity for the American people and a willing consent of the people occupying the territory to be acquired. In such case, while there could be no question as to constitutional power, the circumstances existing at the time would determine as to the wisdom of its exercise.

The great reason for the exercise of this power now by the Congress of the United States applies to Hawaii and not to any other portion of the earth. It does not apply to Mexico, Canada, Cuba, or any other territory on the American Continent. For the reason that after Cuba shall have established a republic, the institutions of all these countries being substantially republican can not be a menace in any way to our liberties, and there are no great commercial necessities, nor can there be any, requiring any government changes in our territorial relations with either of these nations. Hence in our commercial necessities Hawaii stands alone, separate and distinct from any other portion of the earth's surface, and in no way connected with any question that may hereafter arise as to other nations.

The ultimate annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States is not a new question. Every President except one for half a century has notified the nations of the earth that the people of these islands could never unite their destinies with any nation except our own. When England, in 1843, took possession of these islands, Mr. Legaré, then Secretary of State, notified the Government of Great Britain of our position, and she withdrew. Later, when France attempted to take possession, Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, repeated to France in substance Mr. Legaré's dispatch to England, and France withdrew.

For fifty years every President except Cleveland has notified the world that no other nation would be permitted to establish their sovereignty over these islands, and that the people thereon must be allowed to control their own destiny. Grover Cleveland was the first official in the administration of this Government to attempt a reversal of its historical policy relative to Hawaii.

He undertook to restore over that people a monarchy overthrown by its liberty-loving subjects, and, using the revenue cutters and war ships of the nation with shotted guns as a menace in the harbor of Hawaii, he directed his accredited agent to the new Republic to demand, in the name of the United States, that its chosen officials should abdicate their powers, and, kneeling in abject submission at the foot of the restored throne, kiss the extended hand of its dusky Queen. This attempt by the President of the United States to restore a defunct monarchy will brand Grover Cleveland through all time in the annals of impartial history as recreant to liberty and false to the spirit and genius of free institutions.

If I had any doubt as to the vital importance of these islands to the future commercial well-being of the United States, I should hesitate long before setting up my own judgment against the united opinions of the long line of eminent statesmen who have been intrusted with the administration of public affairs, and who are held in so high estimation for political wisdom by their countrymen of all political parties. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] quoted a general opinion by Mr. Sherman against the acquisition of foreign territory, and then attempted to impeach his own witness, who, as Secretary of State, signed the treaty for the acquisition of these very islands included in the resolutions before us.

He could have quoted with equal force from Mr. Legaré and Mr. Webster in their correspondence with England and France in which they declared that it was not the policy of this Government to acquire colonial possession, and yet they both insisted that these islands, by the consent of their people, must some day become a part of American territory, or at least that they never could by our consent become a part of any other. And now when their people desire to cast their political fortunes with ours and we refuse, will it be claimed by anybody that henceforth we can rightfully prevent them from casting their lot with any other nation? Such a refusal would be an attempt on our part to impose upon them a despotic control more odious than was that of Cleveland.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] said that the time might come when it would be, perhaps, advisable to annex these islands, but not now. Now is the only time that the United States can rightfully dispose of that question. After our rejection the destiny of these islands is in the keeping of their people, and to be determined by them alone. Whether their fortunes shall then be cast with England, France, Japan, or any other nation will be for them to determine.

All questions arising out of the existing war with Spain properly belong by themselves and are to be settled in view of the circumstances and conditions existing at the time of their settlement.

In the discussion on the question before us we have heard much about wars and their dangers to liberty. War prosecuted for selfish ends in upholding despotic dynasties or for the mere extension of territorial dominion is an unmitigated, inexcusable barbarism.

But wars, with all their miseries and woes, in the interest of humanity, in behalf of struggling races or nationalities, to secure or regain their inalienable rights, have been of great benefit to mankind. In the world's decisive battles from Marathon to Gettysburg, such battles as have changed for all time the current of human events and the destiny of empires, great battalions have always marched in the rear of great ideas.

The generation of the American people now fast passing away have had not a little home experience in the horrors of war. They have seen their country shrouded in the sable habiliments of mourning and woe and flooded with widows' and orphans' tears. And to the end of this generation an occasional tear for the unreturning brave will glisten in the eye of bereavement around disconsolate firesides. But the new Republic is worth over the old the priceless sacrifice of blood and sorrow which it cost. While "peace has its victories no less renowned than war," yet most of the mighty achievements in the onward progress of the race to a better civilization have been wrought by the sword.

It seems to be a part of the plans of Divine Providence that every marked advance in civilization must begin in mighty convulsions. The moral law was first proclaimed in the thunders of Sinai, and the earthly mission of the Saviour of mankind closed with the rending of mountains and the throes of the earthquake. The Goddess of Liberty herself was born in the shock of battle, and amid its carnage has carved out some of our grandest victories, while o'er its crimson fields the race has marched on to higher and nobler destinies. As the lightnings of heaven rend and destroy only to purify and reinvigorate, so freedom's cannon furrows the fields of decaying empires and seeds them anew with human gore, from which springs a more vigorous race to cherish the hopes and guard the rights of mankind.

The millennium, long promised, when the lion and the lamb will lie down together and a little child shall lead them, will some time come. But not till all governments are based on the consent of the governed and every human being is in the enjoyment of liberty protected by law. Then, and not till then, can the sword be beat into plowshares and the spear into pruning hooks. Until that time the ear of humanity will be pained with the roar of hostile cannon and the angels must weep over the martyred brave.

When the smoke vanished from the last battlefield of the American civil war and its armed hosts returned to their homes, laying aside their armor for the implements of the various avocations of peace, there was a universal belief that the Republic had seen its last war. It was not thought then that any circumstances could possibly ever arise for the Government to call its citizens again from their peaceful pursuits to the tented field. But such a summons has gone forth, and the drumbeat and tramp of marching armies are again heard, and the thrilling reports of unprecedented naval victories come floating over the seas.

This nation is at war with Spain to end her brutal warfare upon women and children and to put a stop to the infliction of her cruel atrocities upon a neighboring people, and because she failed to maintain in the Island of Cuba a government able and willing to protect the lives of American seamen under the flag of their country on a mission of peace to her ports.

In justice to the memory of the hero martyrs who died under the flag of their country by Spanish treachery, and in behalf of the claims of a common humanity, of a people doomed to extermination by starvation and the sword, this nation demanded that Spain should withdraw her flag and forever abandon her sovereignty over the Island of Cuba.

For this purpose the President was authorized to intervene with the Army and the Navy of the United States and stop this doubly cruel and barbarous warfare. When that shall have been done the people of Cuba can then establish for themselves a free and independent government to be recognized by the United States of America as a sister republic.

In the discharge of this national obligation to humanity and to liberty, as well as the higher obligation and duty of protecting the lives of American seamen, under the flag of their country wherever it floats, this nation has intervened with its great power for the accomplishment of such a purpose. And when it shall have been accomplished, the vindication of the patriot heroes who found a watery grave in the harbor of Havana will be the expulsion forever of Spanish sovereignty from the American Continent. And these heroes will not then have died in vain. The tablet that will bear their memory through all time can then be inscribed:

Whether on the scaffold high
Or in the battle's van,
The fittest place where man can die
Is where he dies for man!

The objects to be obtained, and the only ones expected when Congress passed the declaration of war against Spain, were confined to the Island of Cuba. And the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] quoted the declared purpose in that declaration of war to sustain their positions against any acquisition of territory as a result of the war.

I agree with them that when that declaration of war passed there was no purpose or thought by anybody of acquiring additional territory as a result of this war. Humanity alone controlled in the passage of this declaration. But a nation which appeals to battle for the settlement of any question must be ready to meet any and all responsibilities resulting therefrom, whether foreseen or not.

The same Congress of the United States which authorized the equipment of 500,000 men to preserve this Union declared by resolution that the war was not to be prosecuted for the emancipation of slavery. Yet the first gun fired in that conflict was the death knell of human bondage, and the sun in his course across the continent from ocean to ocean no longer rises on a master or sets on a slave.

In our national destiny what new pathways may be blazed out by American cannon on land and battle ships on the seas no prophetic ken can now foresee. And how and in what way the American people ought to discharge the new, unforeseen, unexpected responsibilities cast upon them in far-off Asia no human sagacity can now foretell.

If the intervention of this nation in the affairs of Spain in behalf of humanity and liberty in Cuba shall result, in the providences of God, in the emancipation of ten millions of people in her colonies from her despotic rule, shall the American people shrink from these new responsibilities in behalf of liberty and humanity? Has the rule of Spain in the Philippines been any more humane than in Cuba? Through a long history her cruelty in peace and brutality in war have produced at intervals long or short the Alvas and the Weylers, counterparts of the Neros and Caligulas of pagan Rome in the zenith of her brutal shows of dying gladiators and women and children torn to pieces by wild beasts in the arena of her Coliseum, a gala-day spectacle for Roman holidays.

Within a week after the declaration of war against Spain by the Congress of the United States 8,000,000 of people in the Philippines that had been subjected for four hundred years to the despotic, cruel rule of Spain, such as she had exercised over the Island of Cuba, were liberated from their thralldom by a naval victory in battle unparalleled in the world's history, unexpected and unthought of when the declaration of war against Spain passed.

Commodore Dewey, with a squadron of the American Navy, cruising in Asiatic waters on the customary mission of his Government to friendly nations, suddenly finds himself shut out of the ports and harbors of every nation by the enforcement of the international law of strict neutrality between belligerents. With the Stars and Stripes flying at the masthead of his squadron he enters a harbor of Spain, destroying its land fortifications and sinking a formidable navy moored there for their defense, without the loss of a man or a ship, and with slight injury to either.

Does anyone who believes in the control of an overruling Providence in the affairs of men believe that such a victory was a mere accident? There is a divinity in the destiny of nations as well as in the lives of individuals—

That shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will.

In the retributions for organized national wrongs it is fixed in the immutable decrees of that overruling Providence that nations which incorporate into their institutions, their customs, or their laws a barbarism that blunts the sense of justice and chills the humanity of their people will soon or late surely die. It is the great fact stamped on all the crumbling ruins that strew the pathway of empires.

If we divest ourselves of the egotistical belief so congenial to human nature that the generation of the present is wiser than any that will succeed it, we can then safely intrust the settlement of all public questions to the considerate judgment of the generation that may be called upon to settle them, in full confidence that it will be done quite as wisely and as well as it would be if done by ourselves. Let the present generation with bold and manly hearts meet its own responsibilities to liberty and humanity, and settle them in its own best judgment in view of surrounding circumstances, without reference to supposed conjectural conditions in the future.

Trust no future, howe'er pleasant!
Let the dead past bury its dead!
Act, act in the living present!
Heart within, and God o'erhead!

The starry banner of our fathers, baptized in patriot blood in the first and second war of American independence, and rechristened in the mighty conflict of arms in this generation will henceforth, over whatever portion of the earth's surface it may float, be the emblem of liberty, justice, and the inalienable rights of mankind.

TIME OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, there are so many demands for time to address the House upon this question, upon both sides, that I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock, for debate upon this question. I ask to modify the order that far.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SULZER. That does not interfere with the session to-night, does it?

Mr. HITT. It does not. It is simply that when we adjourn to-night we adjourn to meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

There was no objection.

HAWAII.

Mr. HITT. I yield sixteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HITT. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PEARCE].

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I listened with deep and pleasurable interest on Friday last to the very eloquent argument of my learned friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], because, however much I may disagree with him in his views, I have come to know that he is a fair debater, and I sought to learn from the views which he presented on the subject the gist of the contention against the resolutions which are before us for consideration. He gave us much generality over the alleged unconstitutionality of this proceeding, but without going into an extended discussion of the question, I sincerely hope that some gentleman who succeeds me in this debate will take the trouble to point out one single sentence, or line, or word of the Constitution of the United States that contravenes the adoption of these resolutions. It is a matter of history familiar to everybody that every square mile of territory which has been annexed to the United States since the foundation of the Government has been so annexed under the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution.

The Louisiana Territory, embracing 1,179,981 square miles, was annexed under that provision in 1803; Florida, embracing 59,268 square miles, was annexed under it in 1819; Texas, embracing 376,133 square miles, was annexed under it in 1845; New Mexico and California, embracing 545,783 square miles, were annexed under it in 1848; the Gadsden purchase, embracing 45,535 square miles, was made in pursuance of it in 1853; Alaska, embracing 577,390 square miles, was annexed under it in 1867; and under it it is proposed to annex the Territory of Hawaii, with its 7,000 square miles, in this year of our Lord 1898.

The constitutional questions connected with these various transactions, by which the national area has been increased from first to last nearly 3,000,000 square miles, have been passed upon time and time again by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I had supposed until this hour that the right of annexing foreign territory was a settled question and not open to further discussion excepting for a filibuster against the proposed resolutions.

My learned friend has announced an apparently unique discovery, but which in point of fact is well known to everyone who has ever studied the map of the world or has traveled upon the Pacific Ocean; he states to us that the distance from San Francisco via Unalaska to Hongkong, and of course to the Philippine Islands, is shorter as a sailing route than the distance from San Francisco to the same points via Honolulu, and therefore the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands is an unnecessary measure for purposes of public defense.

It is true that there is a port at Unalaska; it is also true that the northern route from San Francisco to Hongkong and to the Philippine Islands is shorter than the route via Honolulu; it is also true that the Empress Line of steamers, an English line which sails from Vancouver to Yokohama and thence to Hongkong, crosses the Pacific Ocean within sight of the Aleutian Islands. I myself have been over that route, and so has the gentleman from Arkansas, and the statement which he makes in regard to it is unquestionably true. But, Mr. Speaker, what does that prove? Does it establish the contention that the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is an undesirable act upon the part of this Government? Does it establish the contention that those islands are not necessary to the proper defense of the Pacific coast? By no means.

Suppose, for instance, that the Hawaiian Islands should pass under the control of the English Government, a contingency not altogether improbable or remote if we do not take them in ourselves. Now, draw a line from Vancouver or Esquimalt to the Hawaiian Islands, a distance of a little more than 2,000 miles; draw another line from the Hawaiian Islands to the Isthmus of Panama, a distance of a little more than 4,000 miles; consider the fact that the Hawaiian Islands extend from north to south a distance of 400 miles, and take into consideration the military aspects of that situation, with the English Government fortified at Esquimalt commanding the outlet of Puget Sound, fortified at Honolulu and Pearl Harbor, and fortified at the western terminus of the isthmian canal, and is it not conclusive that under this proposed condition of things the entire Pacific coast will be at the mercy of the British Government in the contingency of war? Let me inform you, gentlemen, that the English Government has already acquired an exclusive franchise upon Lake Nicaragua, and has been seeking an isthmian route across the narrow neck of land that separates North and South America. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, if for no other, the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands at this time seems to me to be not only a desirable but a necessary measure on the part of the people of the United States.

But, say my learned friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] and also my learned friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands will mark a new era in the history of our country, and that by it we will enter upon a great expansive colonial policy, the end of which no man can measure. Mr. Speaker, not one intimation of a colonial policy has ever been connected with the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands. This question has occupied the thought of our country for over fifty years. There never has been and is not now advanced any proposition to annex Hawaii as a colonial possession of the United States, and there is no point whatsoever in the contention that this annexation, in any form, manner, or shape, commits either Congress or any gentleman who votes for annexation to a colonial policy.

I am myself at the present time opposed to such a policy, not as a question of legal and constitutional right, but simply and solely as a question of wisdom; and unless the exigencies of the future shall lead me to modify my judgment in that regard, I shall remain in opposition to such a policy. What may become necessary for us to do in settling the details of a future treaty of peace with Spain no man can tell. No one would be reckless enough to commit himself upon that subject. Let me call your attention to the treaty itself, made by the present Administration and the Government of Hawaii in 1897. I quote the language of the treaty: "And it is agreed that all the territory of and appertaining to the Republic of Hawaii is hereby annexed to the United States of America under the name of the Territory of Hawaii." So that upon the consummation of this transaction the relation of the United States Government to Hawaii will become exactly the same as the relation of the United States Government to Alaska at the present time.

Mr. DINSMORE. Will it interrupt my friend if I ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. By no means; not at all.

Mr. DINSMORE. I should like my friend to state to the House whether he can trace any relation between that defunct treaty and these resolutions.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. It has not yet transpired that the treaty referred to by my friend is in any sense defunct. It stands before the Senate to-day as an open question. But irrespective of whether it is or not defunct, these resolutions if adopted by Congress will be carried out upon the lines of that treaty, and the honor and good faith of the people of the United States require and will demand that they shall be carried out upon those lines. When the Hawaiian Islands are taken in under the sovereignty of the United States Government, they will come to us as the Territory of Hawaii, and in no other form, and there are ample provisions in these resolutions for such a consummation.

This leads me, Mr. Speaker, to answer another question propounded during this debate by nearly every gentleman who has occupied a position of antagonism to the pending measure, and that is, "What are you going to do with these islands? How are you going to govern them?" This question seems to be a great obstacle in the way of very many of my friends who have taken part in this discussion. Of course I can not tell, nor can any other man tell, what the Congress of the United States will do in reference to this question, or what provision of government it will legislate into existence. I can only express my own opinion upon that subject, and whether it be worth much or little, if I should happen to be in Congress when the subject comes to be dealt with, I can tell you without any hesitation what I will do. I will vote for a Territorial government in Hawaii. In my opinion it will have a Territorial governor, it will have a Territorial legislature and judicial officers, a government, in short, of the same or similar character as that which exists in Arizona, in New Mexico, in Oklahoma, and in Alaska, with such modifications, of course, as may be suitable to the present or future condition of things. People who imagine that the constitutional electors of Hawaii are incapable of self-government, or are lacking in intelligence, or are unlettered or illiterate are very much mistaken. I have myself no trouble upon that subject, and it does not constitute the slightest obstacle in my judgment. I greatly wonder why any gentleman on this floor should have any trouble upon this subject.

But, says my good friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], the people of Hawaii were not consulted, and therefore we should not take them into our system of government. Let my honorable friend from Arkansas, or any other gentleman on this floor, tell me when in the history of our country, during all the proceedings by which we annexed and incorporated nearly 3,000,000 square miles of additional territory, the question of annexation was ever submitted to the people of either the territory annexed or of the United States to be acted upon by a direct vote?

Mr. DINSMORE. I will suggest to the gentleman the case of Texas.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. My friend says Texas. I expected that suggestion. Of course we all know the details of the history of the annexation of Texas, and it is needless to relate them here. But perhaps you all do not know one fact in connection with that transaction. The annexation of Texas was first sought by a treaty which failed of passage through the United States Senate, but it was the basis of another and subsequent treaty, and the endeavor to secure the result finally terminated in resolutions which passed the House of Representatives and afterwards the Senate and became a law by the approval of the Executive. After those resolutions were passed the legislature of Texas was convened, and a convention of the people was summoned to consider the then pending propositions.

A constitution was drafted and was adopted by both the legislature and the convention, and later the people were called upon to vote upon the ratification of the acts which had been done by those bodies. The main question at this time was the adoption of the constitution, and the question of annexation was merely incidental. Yet, Mr. Speaker, although the population of Texas at that time, exclusive of Indians, was over 130,000, only about 4,100 votes were cast for ratification. Only 4,000 votes out of a population of more than 100,000. Now, I invite you to compare that vote with the present case. The people of the Hawaiian Islands for more than fifty years have been living under a constitution granted to them by the third Kamehameha, and that constitution from the outset has prescribed the qualifications of electors.

The provisions of this instrument, although changed at various times by the Hawaiian Legislature, has never taken away the right of suffrage from the people. It existed in the time of Kalakaua, and it was one of the prominent reasons which led the late Queen Liliuokalani to attempt the overthrow of the constitutional rights of the people and to bring about a return to the absolutism of the early kings. The present constitution also prescribes the qualifications of electors, and the qualified electors of Hawaii who have spoken upon this subject, directly or indirectly, constitute as large a percentage of the population of Hawaii as did the votes cast upon the ratification of the annexation of Texas taken in comparison with the population of that State.

I was exceedingly glad to learn from the speech of my good friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] that amid all the reasons why the Hawaiian Islands should not be annexed to the United States he freely and frankly admitted that there was one powerful consideration in favor of these resolutions. He says that the possession of the Hawaiian Islands by the United States would greatly increase the power of the American Government to keep foreign nations off our shores. In God's name, what else do we want them for, looking at the subject from a military point of view? We are not seeking the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands to make aggressive war upon the rest of mankind.

The possession of the islands for purposes of public defense is the exact point, and the only point, for which I am arguing and contending. One of the great reasons why we want and must have those islands is to make it absolutely impossible for a foreign government to assail us, and especially to render it impossible for an Asiatic power, with an Asiatic religion, to seat itself within 2,000 miles of our Pacific coast. In my judgment no admission could be made that would constitute a stronger argument for the adoption of these resolutions than the fair and honest statement of my honorable friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE].

Another point of difficulty which troubles my friends who oppose this measure is the question of the cost of maintenance. Upon that question the records of the Hawaiian Government furnish us valuable information. Aggregating the public revenues from 1878 to 1893, and deducting from the aggregate the expenditures during the same period of time, we find that for a period of fourteen years the expenditure over revenue is only $309,534, notwithstanding the fact that during that period the islands suffered two revolutions, with all the extraordinary expenses incident thereto. In 1896 the public revenues were $1,997,818 and the aggregate expenditures were $1,904,190, leaving a balance to the credit of the Government on December 31, 1896, of $93,627. Under any reasonable administration of affairs by an intelligent territorial government the Hawaiian Islands can be made fully self-supporting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, whatever views people may have heretofore had upon this subject, whether those views have been upon general political lines or whether they have proceeded upon commercial lines, we are to-day confronted with the condition of war, and we are compelled to consider this question from a standpoint which the opponents of annexation have always heretofore scouted as a possibility too remote to constitute a reasonable argument. Whether we will or no, we are compelled to look at this subject from that standpoint and legislate with reference to it.

With a voice almost unanimous the people of the United States have declared at the polls and through us, their representatives, that the Island of Cuba shall be hereafter free from the sovereignty of Spain. To make that declaration good and to compel a recognition of that independence by Spain we have declared war upon that Government. By our unanimous voice we have authorized and directed the President of the United States to employ the entire military and naval power of the country, and also its material resources, and have charged him with the tremendous responsibility of conducting that war to a successful issue. Having done that, having charged him with this great and solemn responsibility, we can not, without stultifying ourselves, withhold from him any measure which he thinks is necessary to bring that consummation about.

In the performance of the duties laid upon him by the people and by Congress, he has a right to ask for any provision, no matter what it may be, that will either contribute to the power of attack or will fortify our own country against every contingency that can possibly arise out of a state of war. We are not playing a game of politics or diplomacy to-day. It is war, and in it is bound up not only the freedom of Cuba but the national honor of our own country. That which a few months ago was thought to be too remote for serious consideration is to-day a stern and unalterable fact. I care not what your views or my views upon this subject might be under ordinary circumstances. It is to-day a measure of war, and as such it stands before this Congress, and I envy not the man who, after having laid upon the President the duty of aggressive attack and also of providing a complete system of harbor and coast-line defense, stops now to split hairs over historical precedents or judicial interpretations of constitutional law.

I envy not the man who in these days of armed conflict will withhold from the President any measure of legislation which in his judgment or in the judgment of his war council is deemed necessary to make his efforts effective. No amount of caviling as to whether the recommendations of the President or the action of Congress were right or wrong, justifiable or unjustifiable; no philanthropic feelings over the sacrifices already made or which shall be made in the future; no protest over the expenditure of money which has been or shall become necessary; no measuring of cause or effect; no predictions as to whether this conflict shall be fought out by Spain and the United States, or whether all the nations of Europe will be involved before the end shall be reached, can avail one jot or tittle to change the grim unalterable fact that we are in a state of war.

Already the field of operations embraces one-third of the water area of the world. Where its limitations will be three months hence no man can tell. Ninety days ago not a man in this House would have ventured the prediction that the first scene of the great drama would open upon the coast of Asia. We thought we were going straightway to Cuba. We never dreamed that the first victory of American arms would be in the far-off archipelago of the Philippines.

Who will venture to predict what the next scene of this swift-moving drama will reveal? Will it be the intervention of the powers to compel Spain to surrender Cuba? Will it be a protest by France against the impairment of her bonded security in Spanish domains, or will it be a German demand for joint occupancy or division of the conquered territory? Will the United States settle this business by force of arms, as she has started to settle it, with Spain alone, or will the next shifting of the scenes reveal an European alliance to protect Spain from destruction, or to play the rôle of Russia in the late war between China and Japan? No man can tell what lies in the future, and in the early future.

While the purposes of the United States in this conflict are directed to freeing the Western Hemisphere from a despotism which for four centuries has been a blight upon civilization and a curse to downtrodden millions of the human race, no man in this presence will dare to say that the American flag, once planted in a just and holy war, at home or abroad, shall ever be removed except by the free act of the American Government.

But, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, while this is unquestionably the high resolve of the American people, it is your duty and the duty of us all as legislators, as citizens, as patriotic lovers of our country, to discard all our preconceived notions about the desirability or non-desirability of the Hawaiian Islands, and to do that which will strengthen our Army and our Navy, and to see to it that every preparation which statesmanship and human ingenuity can devise shall be made, to meet not only the exigencies of the war with Spain, but also every possible exigency that may follow a European alliance created to take from the hands of the United States Government the settlement of the questions which may logically arise out of this conflict.

I do not know that such an alliance will come to pass. It is enough for me to know that it is one of the possibilities of the future, a possibility which has some threatening aspects at the present time. Notwithstanding the bold and remarkable statement of Mr. Chamberlain, I do not believe in relying upon the sympathetic interference of Great Britain, or of Japan, or of any other country. I would rather rely upon the physical strength and resourceful power of our own 70,000,000 liberty-loving people than upon the sympathy of any foreign nation, however friendly, or upon all Europe combined. God helps those who help themselves.

Mr. Speaker, we have had a rude awakening since this crisis began. Fortunately for us, and perhaps fortunate for the world, we have had to deal with a nation infinitely weaker than ourselves in material resources, and as illy prepared to meet the exigencies of a great war. Less than five years ago nearly 1,000 cities and towns located upon open ports and upon tributary streams along and contiguous to our 5,000 miles of coast were absolutely defenseless against foreign attack. Five years ago the Navy of the United States was the weakest of the first-class powers and, for lack of munitions and crews practiced in the service of modern ordnance, was comparatively useless for offensive or defensive war; and yet, Mr. Speaker, we were asserting against every nation in Europe a doctrine of exclusion from the Western Hemisphere, never recognized as a tenet of international law, and depending alone for its maintenance upon the moral influence of this Republic. However just and necessary the Monroe doctrine may be from our standpoint of view, and however deep-rooted it may be in the conscience of the American people, it is unquestionably an affront to every nation in Europe, and is to-day acknowledged with illy concealed reluctance by Japan in her relations with the Hawaiian Islands.

I warn gentlemen on this floor that we have seen enough in the last twelve months to satisfy any reflecting man, that the perpetuation of the Monroe doctrine can only be made possible by the speedy development of the naval power of the United States up to a degree of efficiency that will enable us at all times to successfully resist the encroachments of any government on earth. What does this involve, Mr. Speaker? Shall we rely upon the integrity of foreign alliances? Why, sir, no such convention was ever made anywhere or at any time but it was torn into shreds at the dictation of self-interest or by the shifting demands of oncoming exigencies.

I venture the assertion that if Congress had given heed twenty years ago to the warnings which have been iterated and reiterated over and over again on this floor, every American port would to-day be impregnable against assault, our Navy would be peerless upon the seas, no war with Spain would ever have occurred, three hundred millions of money would have been saved, Cuba would be free, her people, wasted by starvation and savagery, would be on the high road of progress, and the Maine, instead of rotting beneath the loathsome waters of Havana Harbor with her murdered crew, would be riding the waves.

I ask again, Mr. Speaker, what does the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine involve? We are not so wise, our rights and responsibilities are not so small, our statesmanship is not so far-seeing, but that we can learn a lesson of wisdom from our competitors in the race for national development. With the advent of steam as a motive power Great Britain, without halting for the evolution of the future, began immediately to reconstruct her navy. New armaments and dry docks followed hard after, and then began the establishment of that wonderful system of supply stations which to-day belt the world. While continental Europe and America remained wrapped up in the conservatism of the fathers, Great Britain pushed forward into the new order of things until at every coigne of military and commercial vantage, at Gibraltar, at Malta, at Port Said, at Aden, at Bombay, at Calcutta, at Madras, at Colombo, at Singapore, at Sydney, at Melbourne, at New Zealand, at Hongkong, at Victoria, and at Vancouver, she sits intrenched with limitless stores to reinforce her naval power. For the purposes of this consideration it matters not whether we praise or condemn her foreign and colonial policy. She sits complacent behind her naval ramparts, mistress of the seas, with incalculable powers of defense and offense, able and ready to vindicate her sovereignty everywhere, and to guarantee at all times safety to every advance agent of her commercial enterprise.

Agas before Columbus lifted the veil from the Western Hemisphere Asiatic commerce was the pursuit of empires. Along its shifting routes, from the Phœnicians down to the present day, great cities have risen and passed away, their aggrandizement and decay inexorably measured by their ability to adapt themselves to new developments or by their disposition to hold on to obsolete and worn-out systems. Constantinople, Genoa, Venice, Lisbon, and Amsterdam have each in its day gathered wealth and splendor from the inexhaustible stores of the Orient, and each has fallen from leadership in proportion as it has kept its eye on the past rather than upon the future. England, looking behind, saw the cities of the Mediterranean rise and fall with the shifting of control over the great thoroughfares to Asia. Looking into the future, she saw a great productive population gathering upon the eastern coast of America, spreading in great waves over a continent, subduing mountains and harnessing rivers to its uses, while it reached out across the Pacific for a share in that wonderful commerce. Foreseeing the magnitude of this new competition, she bought the control of the Suez Canal, deepened and widened its channel, enlarged her ship capacity from 3,500 to 7,000 tons, and reduced her freight charges from $7 to $3 per long ton. Not content with that provision of security, she built a transcontinental railway through Canada and established a steamship line from Vancouver to China and Australia. Not content with that provision, she undertook to gain a lodgment at the mouth of the Orinoco, in defiance of the Monroe doctrine, and is to-day reaching for an isthmian route to the Indies, to fortify and still further facilitate her monopoly of oriental commerce.

Now, what is all this to us? In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it emphasizes the fact that while the development of the American Navy is absolutely essential to the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine, and to the development of our commerce with foreign nations, and to the protection of our own coast against foreign attack, a navy without practicable and defensible coaling stations is as useless as an army without food.

No man can foresee the potentiality of the forces which are gathering on the Asiatic coast. With Great Britain in India, in Polynesia, in the Malachian Straits, and in Hongkong, with France in Cambodia, with Russia in Manchuria, with Germany in her newly acquired Chinese ports, and with Japan pushing forward with prodigious strides, it is apparent on the face of the situation that the United States must either surrender the commerce which she has already acquired or she must fortify herself by all the means known to the establishment of commercial power, and which have been advantageous agencies in the experience of competing nations.

It is for these reasons, looking at the subject from a standpoint of national defense and national progress, that I have for many years advocated the peaceful acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands. I happen to have been twice in the Hawaiian Islands. I was there first in 1881, and as a result of that visit I became and have ever since remained an ardent advocate of annexation, believing that action to be not only desirable but necessary, and both not only from a military but from a commercial point of view. I am not guided by any party or political declarations upon this subject. I was thoroughly convinced years ago that the acquisition of these islands, with the facilities afforded in Pearl Harbor, was absolutely necessary in order to a successful defense of our Pacific coast.

From a military point of view the most interesting feature in these islands is the harbor which I have already mentioned. It is situated in the island of Oahu, about 7 miles from the city of Honolulu. The distance from the harbor to the open sea is about 4 miles, and they are connected by a narrow passage not more than a third of a mile in width. At the outer end of this passage there is a sand bar, easily removable at a cost of about $100,000. In this harbor there are 3 square miles of water which is from 5 to 10 fathoms deep, and an area of smaller size from 2 to 4 fathoms in depth. The locality is free from storms of sufficient severity to endanger shipping, and in the neighborhood are abundant supplies of fresh and healthful water.

The harbor approaches are easily defensible, and it is calculated by military experts that $500,000 will make it substantially impregnable against naval attacks. Here the entire American Navy can ride in absolute security. There are no other inclosed harbors in the entire group, and none other exists for thousands of miles west or south. Throughout the eastern two-thirds of the North Pacific Ocean it is the only place available as a naval and coaling station outside the American coast. The control of Pearl Harbor, therefore, gives to the nation which holds it the mastery of the Pacific Ocean north of the Equator, and it is, therefore, of incalculable strategic value to the United States. A foreign power possessing Pearl Harbor would be within easy striking distance of the Pacific coast, and in case of war would have the ability to speedily annihilate, not only American commerce on the open Pacific Ocean, but also our coastwise trade, from Alaska to its southernmost point.

What stronger argument for the possession of the Hawaiian Islands can be conceived of than the fact that our Philippine fleet, if compelled by the exigencies of war or by stress of weather to abandon its present vantage ground, has no place of safety or supply short of the harbor of San Francisco, and is subject, while perhaps in a crippled condition, to pursuit and attack throughout that entire distance until within the sheltering embrace of the Golden Gate?

Captain Mahan, whose splendid essay upon sea power has excited the applause of the world, says in a recent paper:

It is not practicable for any trans-Pacific country to invade our Pacific coast without occupying Hawaii as a base.

And further:

It is obvious that if we do not hold these islands ourselves we can not expect the neutrals in the war to prevent the other belligerents from occupying them, nor can the inhabitants themselves prevent it. In short, we should need a larger navy to defend the Pacific coast, because we should have to not only defend our own coast but to prevent by naval force an enemy from occupying the islands, whereas if we preoccupied them fortifications would preserve them to us.

Another eminent authority, George Melville, Chief Engineer of the United States Navy, says:

Hawaii bridges the stretch of seas, which, without the island group, would be, at this stage in the development of marine propulsion, impassable to an enemy's fleet. Pearl Harbor is the sole key to the full defense of our western coast, and that key should lie in our grasp only.

It does not make a particle of difference what the condition of China is to-day. In the philosophy of that mysterious people, "waiting" is the most God-like of human virtues—all things come to him who waits. It matters not how friendly Japan is under present circumstances. It is of no importance that England and Russia are engrossed in a contest for commercial supremacy in the far East. There is not an exigency in the great drama of the world's politics to-day that may not be shifted into new relations and unexpected contests to-morrow.

While Pearl Harbor can be made a veritable Gibraltar in point of impregnability, it forms an unparalleled vantage ground from which a naval force can sail with a full equipment of coal and munitions for attack in any quarter. Again says this eminent authority:

Pearl Harbor would form a first line of defense, and an enemy from the open sea would violate some of the cardinal principles of naval strategy and invite sure disaster in attacking our western coast without first blockading or defeating the Hawaiian squadron.

Says Admiral Belknap:

A glance at a chart of the Pacific will indicate to the most casual observer the great importance and inestimable value of this island as a strategic point. Indeed, it would seem that nature had established that group to be ultimately occupied as an outpost, as it were, of the great Republic on its western border, and that the time had now come for the fulfillment of said design.

Lieutenant-General Schofield, after a personal examination of the Hawaiian Islands, expressed the following cogent views:

I have always regarded the ultimate annexation of the islands as a public necessity. I have looked that harbor to a commanding position in front of a defensive line which the army in the field is compelled to occupy. The army must occupy that advance position and hold it at whatever cost or else the enemy will occupy it with his artillery and dominate the main line. If we do not occupy and fortify Pearl Harbor, our enemy will occupy it as a base from which to conduct operations against our Pacific coast and the Isthmian Canal. One of the great advantages of Pearl Harbor to us consists in the fact that no navy would be required to defend it. It is a deep land-locked arm of the sea, easily defended by fortifications placed near its mouth, with its anchorage beyond the reach of guns from the ocean. Cruisers and other war ships which might be overpowered at sea, as well as merchant vessels, would find there beyond the land defenses absolute security against naval attack.

The following is the opinion of Admiral Dupont on this phase of the subject:

It is impossible to estimate too highly the value and importance of the Sandwich Islands, whether in a commercial or military point of view. Should circumstances place them in our hands, they would prove a most important acquisition intimately connected with our commercial supremacy in those seas.

The unqualified and concurring judgment of these distinguished scientists do not by any means stand alone. Everybody who has examined the subject from the standpoint of national defense, and whose opinion is entitled to consideration, is equally emphatic, whereas not a strategist of experience and recognized ability has ever presented an opinion contrary to the expressions which I have taken the liberty to quote. Whatever views members may have upon other phases of the subject, unquestionably from a military standpoint the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands stands before Congress as a measure equal, if not superior, in importance and urgency to the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal.

Mr. Speaker, I have a profound respect and an instinctive feeling of deference for the opinions of the distinguished ex-Secretary of State who has just retired to private life after a career unsurpassed by that of any American statesman for usefulness and wisdom; but I can not agree with his contention that the Government of the United States has an indefeasible title to Pearl Harbor, irrespective of the maintenance or abrogation of the reciprocity treaty now existing. The grant of an usufructory interest in that harbor was made in consideration of the provisions of that treaty, not in perpetuity, but constructively during the life of the treaty. It is a part of the treaty, and in my judgment is inseparable from it. Its abrogation terminates all of its subsisting provisions, and it would be a violent assumption to hold that the rights vested thereby would continue to exist after the basis upon which they stand had been destroyed by the action of the American Government.

I can not see any validity in the proposition that the American Government can exercise its right to terminate the treaty in twelve months after notice, and notwithstanding that termination hold on to one of the chief considerations of the grant. To do so, even if we had the power to do it, would be a manifest fraud on the Hawaiian Government, and could never find support and countenance in the moral sense of the American people. No such proposition ever entered into the negotiations which culminated in that convention, or in its renewal, nor has it ever existed, nor does it exist to-day in the understanding of the Hawaiian Government. Such is the statement not only of the premier of the Hawaiian Government, but also of Mr. Bayard, late Secretary of State.

If that group of islands should pass by voluntary cession into the sovereignty of a European state, or, through the operations of the peaceful invasion of the Japanese, which during the last ten years has increased that population from 2,700 to nearly if not quite 32,000, should become directly or indirectly absorbed into the Japanese system, I can not for one moment believe that any such pretension of the United States to the ownership of Pearl Harbor would be admitted by any court of international arbitration. In the face of such conditions, either the one or the other of which is more than a probability, the assertion of the Monroe doctrine or of an exclusive proprietary interest in Pearl Harbor would inevitably precipitate another foreign war. Irrespective of any other consideration, the avoidance of such a risk is, in my judgment, of transcendent importance.

Mr. Speaker, the splendid domain of the Hawaiian Islands, situated within the arc of our existing possessions, is to-day offered with all rights of sovereignty to the United States as the free gift of the existing and established Government, together with all public lands and property, and with no condition whatsoever beyond the assumption of the public debt to the maximum amount of $4,000,000. If accepted by the passage of this measure, that great entrepôt, lying in the highway of the future commerce of the East and the West, will peacefully pass into the possession of the American people, assuring to them perpetual immunity from hostile attack, a strategic position of incalculable value in time of war, a harbor of refuge in storm or calamity, and a magnificent supply station for our Navy and merchant marine through all the exigencies of our country's future.

If, on the contrary, Congress shuts the door upon this tender, the Hawaiian Islands must of necessity pass under foreign dominion. Not one of the constituent elements of the Hawaiian population is sufficiently strong to maintain for any prolonged period of time an independent form of government against internecine conflict or foreign aggression. If we refuse to extend our own sovereignty and protection, the United States can not, with any show of justice or sanction of right recognizable by other nations, invoke the principles of the Monroe doctrine against a voluntary treaty of cession to Great Britain or to Germany or to France, which may become necessary to the preservation of the rights and the protection of the lives of the Hawaiian people against domestic or foreign violence.

But whether as a matter of principle the Monroe doctrine could be applied or whether it could not be, yet, nevertheless, in the absence of a voluntary cession to a European power, the gravitation to Japan and finally absorption by that country will be the inevitable destiny of the Hawaiian people. Under the constitution of that Republic it is easy to be seen that it is only a matter of time when the Japanese population may lawfully acquire control of all the legislative and administrative functions of the Government, in which event the transition to a colonial system, autonomous in its character, but yielding allegiance to the Emperor, would be altogether too imperceptible to justify interference at any particular period of time, or even to render interference possible without a war with that Empire. Thus, by a movement similar to those which have heretofore characterized the migration of nations, there would be eventually precipitated that greatest of all conceivable calamities, the planting of an Asiatic population and the founding of an Asiatic cult two-thirds of the stretch across the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. Speaker, another point of contention against this measure is that by the acquisition of these islands we will largely increase our coast line necessary to be defended, and therefore the acquisition would be a source of weakness rather than of strength. There is no force in this contention. Pearl Harbor is the only landlocked harbor in the entire Hawaiian group, and the only place that could be made available as a naval base. In the possession of the United States, no foreign enemy could maintain a lodgment anywhere on the entire coast line for any purpose whatsoever. Susceptible of being made as impregnable as Gibraltar, it has the superior advantage of being a refuge against storm as well as against superior forces, while it is a coign of vantage from which every trade route in the Southern Pacific can be flanked, giving unparalleled facilities for the assailing or defending commerce, and absolutely dominating not only the island coast line, but also every ocean highway from Alaska to the Equator.

After traversing all the waters of the globe, I know of no position which can be so cheaply fortified or maintained, which will give to the Government so great an influence in maritime commerce, and which can be made so tremendously effective in the possible conflicts of the future.

Aside from strategic considerations, common justice to a weak and defenseless neighbor demands that the United States shall either recognize the neutrality obligations of a noncombatant or else shall eliminate those obligations from the forum of future contentions by an incorporation into our own system. We are to-day using the Island of Oahu as a base of supplies and a naval station in open defiance of the well-recognized laws governing neutral powers and in absolute contradiction of our own demand upon all other nations in the world.

Can anyone doubt that the principles of the Alabama case would determine the judgment of any court of international arbitration if a call for damages should be hereafter made upon Hawaii by the Government of Spain? Can anyone doubt that the collection of a judgment by seizure of Hawaiian revenues, or the occupation of Hawaiian territory until satisfaction was rendered, would be upheld by European nations in spite of the Monroe doctrine unless the United States paid the award? Our action already taken is absolutely indefensible upon any other theory than that the treaty already concluded gives quasi jurisdictional rights pending ratification.

The annexation of Hawaii is wholly disconnected from and independent of any questions growing out of our contest with Spain. Repeating what I have heretofore said, this subject in one form or another has been before the American people and before Congress for over fifty years, and it would have been accomplished long ago had it not been for the contentions of political parties and the overshadowing exigencies of the civil war. No proposition of colonial establishment has ever entered into the negotiations of the two Governments. The treaty of 1893 and also that of 1897 both provided that the Hawaiian Islands shall be incorporated into the territory of the United States as an integral part thereof, and shall be known as the Territory of Hawaii, and as such shall be governed by such laws as Congress shall enact.

The undertaking to connect this subject with the fate of the Philippine Islands, of Puerto Rico, is simply and solely a makeshift of the opposition to defeat this measure by the sinuous arts of parliamentary tactics, notwithstanding the fact that a vast majority of the American people have already substantially voted for annexation and that a majority of both Houses of this Congress are waiting to vote for it at the earliest possible opportunity.

Speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, although for twenty years I have been convinced of the wisdom of this proceeding from every standpoint of view, present and future, yet, laying aside all other considerations which relate to commercial development and the progress of civilization, it is enough for me to know that the President of the United States, charged with the responsibility of prosecuting this war to a successful issue, regards the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands as a military necessity. With that knowledge I will give him my loyal support, and I will never consent that this session of Congress shall adjourn until these resolutions have been fully acted upon.

Mr. Speaker, there is no novelty in the objections which are urged against this measure. They were urged against the purchase of Louisiana in 1803. The Federalists of that day challenged the constitutionality of the acquisition, and even Mr. Jefferson questioned it. But Congress and the Supreme Court decided otherwise. They were urged against the annexation of Texas by the Abolitionists of the North and by many statesmen of the South. Whole tomes of statistics were summoned to prove that the heterogeneous population gathered within those districts could never be ameliorated, and would prove to be an eternal menace to our republican institutions. But they were annexed nevertheless, and to-day they are teeming with wealth, intelligence, and industrial energy. They were urged against the acquisition of New Mexico and California, and one of the greatest speeches Webster ever made was an invective against that terra incognita. Nevertheless, nearly $20,000,000 was given as the price of that territory, and it has proven to be an inexhaustible storehouse of mineral and agricultural wealth. They were urged still more vehemently against the purchase of Alaska, and Mr. Seward was charged with political lunacy for paying eight millions of good money for a region of eternal icebergs. But, Mr. Speaker, in all these so-called unconstitutional, irrational, and unstatesmanlike performances we builded wiser than we knew, and out of those vast regions of tropical jungle and arctic waste a great nation has grown up to subdue the sterile places of the earth and to bless humanity. Who to-day would turn backward this wonderful march of progress? Who would not rather carry it forward, relying upon the inspirations and the strength of American intelligence and upon the providence of Almighty God?

Mr. Speaker, it is urged that the people of the Hawaiian Islands are incapable of self-government, and therefore annexation must necessarily be hostile to the best interests of the American people. Of the present constituent elements of Hawaiian population, the Chinese, numbering nearly 22,000, can safely be regarded as only temporary sojourners in the islands. With the application of American laws against further immigration, the immediate outgo of this element will begin; and in a comparatively short period of time they will become greatly reduced in point of numbers, if they do not entirely disappear. The Japanese are fairly good material for future citizenship. They are acquisitive of knowledge, industrious and economical, and easily molded in the forms and usages of the society in which they locate.

Taking the native Hawaiians, Portuguese, the British, the Germans, and the Americans into consideration, the percentage of intelligence existing at the present time among these elements is as large as that which exists in any of the new sections of our own country. Out of 15,191 Portuguese residents, 48.8 per cent were born on the islands. The percentage of industrials is over 91 per cent of the entire working population, fully up to the showing of the most advanced nations of the world. Of 93,105 people over 6 years of age, 63.9 per cent are able to read and write. Excluding the Portuguese, the Japanese, and the Chinese, the percentage of those able to read and write rises to nearly 86 per cent.

The percentage of children attending school is still more remarkable. The total number of children within the school age—viz, 6 to 15—was reported in 1896 to be 14,296, out of which the school attendants were 13,744, or 96.2 per cent, an increase of nearly 15 per cent over 1890 and over 25 per cent over 1884. While the natives of full Hawaiian blood appear to be decreasing, the native born of mixed Hawaiian stock is very largely on the increase, such births rising from 1,568 in 1890 to 2,590 in 1896, a gain of 65 per cent. The children born in the islands of parents both foreign have increased from 5,018 in 1890 to 8,339 in 1896, a gain of 65 per cent.

These increases are mostly among Hawaiians, Europeans, and Americans, showing the rise of a new stock thoroughly amenable to the influences of Anglican civilization, into which it is rapidly merging year by year. The contention, therefore, that there is any antagonism, physical, moral, intellectual, or social, between the people who can be regarded as permanent residents of the Hawaiian Islands and the people of the United States is no more valid than the early contention that the people of Louisiana, Texas, New Mexico, and California would never coalesce with the Anglo-Saxon population of the original States.

COMMERCIAL CONSIDERATIONS.

Mr. Speaker, I have been considering this measure more particularly from the standpoint of the proposition that the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands at this time is necessary for the proper protection of the Pacific coast. A word or two upon the commercial side of this question as it relates to the future prosperity of the United States. For a quarter of a century the demand has come from every quarter of our country for the enlargement of our foreign commerce, and yet during all that time not a single measure of substantial importance has ever been enacted by Congress or by any commercial body of the United States which constitutes a basis upon which that enlargement can proceed.

Outside of Honolulu and the cities of Mexico and Guadalajara there is not an American office of exchange in any foreign port of the Western Hemisphere or in the oriental world where an American negotiation can be carried on. Every commercial bill, every loan of money, every mercantile and affreightment contract, has to be negotiated in an English office and pay tribute in one form or another to English enterprise. Everywhere, in Mexico, in Central and South America, in Polynesia, in India, in Ceylon, in the Straits Settlements, in China, in Japan, and even in Hawaii, English institutions exist, founded under the broad, far-reaching policy of the British Government to increase and monopolize every branch of foreign trade, and not until the people of this country outgrow the swaddling clothes bequeathed to them by the narrow policy of "insular isolation" will they ever have a permanent share in the mighty commerce which beats its wings in the waves of the broad Pacific.

In the face of the universally recognized need of the Nicaragua Canal we have been wasting precious time haggling and splitting hairs over the difference between minimum and maximum estimates of cost when the gain to American commerce in every year after its construction will be more than the entire expenditure. The progressive enterprise of the United States, the manufacturers of the North, the cotton growers of the South, the farmers of Oregon and California, all demand a short route between the oceans, and the peerless voyage of the Oregon to join the front battle line in our war with Spain emphasizes that demand with an eloquence beyond the power of human speech.

The construction of this great waterway connecting the two oceans, following upon the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands and the independence of Cuba, will reach a consummation not less magnificent than those splendid transactions which in the early history of our country laid the foundations of national wealth, national power, and national glory, all which have been the wonder of the world and the honorable pride of every American citizen. Powerful to resist attack from without, loving peace at home and abroad, this great country will then have reached the acme of its destiny, and its beneficent influence upon the nations and the peoples of the earth will be the glory of the twentieth century.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] such time as he may desire.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the Hawaiian question in one form or another has been a familiar one in the diplomacy of our Government for fifty years. The pending resolutions, by which it is proposed to annex the Hawaiian Islands to the United States and to pay their debts, amounting to $4,000,000, for the privilege of adding their troubles to our own, furnishes the first occasion in the history of the question when the representatives of the people of the United States have been called upon to sanction the scheme; and thus it may be truthfully said that while the project is old to diplomacy, it is new to the masses of the people of the country.

Our first interest in the Sandwich Islands was due to whale oil, and was fostered by missionaries, and became superseded by the Standard Oil Company, who, finding it easier to corner the oil in rocks than the oil in whales, discarded the whaler for the tank car and disappointed the ever-faithful missionary in his hopes of a whale-oil dynasty in the Pacific. It is curious to observe that Great Britain has pinned her faith to incorporated trading companies as the surest means of commercial and territorial acquisitions, while the American puts his trust in the philanthropy of the missionary to accomplish the desired brotherly love of political and commercial union.

Our renewed interest in these islands is due to sugar, and to sugar is due the Hawaiian question, both as it has existed for the past thirty years and in the form in which it is now presented.

The arguments employed in support of annexation may be classified under two general heads: First, the importance of the islands to the United States for military purposes; and second, the importance of the islands for commercial purposes. A candid discussion of the question involves an examination of the merits of the military and the commercial theories.

Happily for us, military experts have given, by direction of our Government, consideration to the value of these islands for naval purposes, and their carefully prepared reports have become a part of the history of the question. The Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department has kept accurate accounts of our commerce with the islands for twenty years, and the theories of naval strategists are being tested in the light of the fires of actual war.

The military phase of the question is better understood and better presented by the military experts who have given attention to it, and I am certain that I shall not understate their case if I permit them to speak in its behalf.

In May, 1873, Gen. J. M. Schofield and Gen. B. S. Alexander made a report to Hon. William W. Belknap, Secretary of War, the condition of which I repeat from them in full, because it is important in this and in another connection in which I shall allude to it:

In compliance with your confidential instructions of the 24th of June, 1872, we have the honor to state that we have visited the Sandwich Islands and ascertained the defensive capabilities of their different ports, examined into their commercial facilities, and collected all the information in our power on other subjects in reference to which we ought to be informed in the event of a war with a powerful maritime nation, and we have now the honor to submit the following report:

Material parts of the report are as follows:

We ascertained from the officers of the United States Navy, from maps, and from seafaring men that Honolulu is the only good commercial harbor in the group of the Sandwich Islands.

There are many other so-called harbors or places of anchorage, but they are mostly open roadsteads affording shelter only from certain winds, and they are all entirely incapable of being defended by shore batteries. Even the harbor of Honolulu itself can not be defended from the shore. It is a small harbor lying seaward from the land and only protected from the sea by outlying coral reefs. An enemy could take up his position outside of the entrance to the harbor and command the entire anchorage as well as the town of Honolulu itself. This harbor would, therefore, be of no use to us as a harbor of refuge in a war with a powerful maritime nation.

With one exception, there is no harbor on the islands than can be made to satisfy all the conditions necessary for a harbor of refuge in time of war, and this is the harbor of Ewa, or Pearl River, situated on the Island of Oahu, about 7 miles west of Honolulu.

Then, describing in detail the advantages of Pearl Harbor, the report proceeds:

In case it should become the policy of the Government of the United States to obtain the possession of this harbor for naval purposes, jurisdiction over all the waters of Pearl River, with the adjacent shores to the distance of 4 miles from any anchorage, should be ceded to the United States by the Hawaiian Government.

This would be necessary in order to enable the Government to defend its depots and anchorages in time of war by works located on its own territory. Such a cession of jurisdiction would embrace a parallelogram of about 10 to 12 miles.

It would not be necessary, however, for the Government of the United States to own all this land. On the contrary, Rabbit Island and a few thousand acres of the shore to the northward and westward of it, the limits of which could be determined after careful survey, with sufficient land on either side of the entrance of the harbor for fortification purposes, equal in area to about 1 square mile on either side, would be all the land which it would be necessary for the Government to own. All the land which might be embraced in any cession of jurisdiction could remain in the hands of the present owners.

For the sake of argument, then, I concede that Pearl Harbor is without a rival as a naval station in the Pacific and that it is the only available harbor for naval purposes in the Hawaiian Islands. As to the strategic value of the Hawaiian Islands for the defense of our Pacific coast, we may concede, for the sake of argument, all that is claimed for it by Capt. A. T. Mahan, and for full measure adopt the rhetorical extravagance of those enthusiasts with whom Hawaii is the "Cross-roads of the Pacific," the "Key of the Pacific," and, still more ambitiously, the "Gibraltar of the Pacific." Elaborate these claims of unrivaled advantage as you will, the pith of the case for annexation from the military standpoint is fully stated.

It will be observed that the report of General Schofield was made in 1873, and to secure Pearl Harbor the reciprocity treaty, when renewed in 1887, was extended in these terms:

The exclusive right to enter the harbor of Pearl River, in the Island of Oahu, and to establish and maintain there a coaling and repair station for the use of vessels of the United States, and to that end the United States may improve the entrance of said harbor and do all things needful for the purpose aforesaid.

As to the extent and effect of this treaty, I am quite willing to adopt the opinion of those distinguished members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate who signed the Senate report favoring the resolution for annexation now pending in that body: Senators C. K. DAVIS, JOHN T. MORGAN, WILLIAM P. FRYE, S. M. CULLOM, H. C. LODGE, J. B. FORAKER, and CLARENCE D. CLARK. In this report they say:

In the treaty of reciprocity of 1875 the United States demanded, as the consideration of admitting the staple productions of Hawaii free of duty into our ports, that Hawaii should so far renounce her sovereignty over her public domain, her crown lands, and her ports, bays, and harbors that she could not dispose of them, or of any exclusive or special privileges in them, without the consent of the United States.

The gravity of this concession of her sovereign authority over her own territory to the United States was shown in 1894, when Great Britain proposed that Hawaii should grant to her the exclusive right to land a cable on Necker Island, to which Hawaii was willing, but both governments fully recognized the fact that the consent of the United States was necessary to be obtained.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. The understanding I have of the treaty is that in the event of any cessation of the present relations between the Hawaiian Government and the United States all the rights granted under that treaty would cease with it; and that Secretary Bayard wrote a letter, which is now on file in the archives of the Hawaiian Islands, in which he said it should be so construed, and he did so construe it as Secretary of State of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Is that a statement or a question?

Mr. BERRY. I ask you whether you do not recognize the fact that when the treaty is dissolved, as it may be on one year's notice, would it not do away with all the rights of the United States in the island?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. On the strength of my own feeble opinion, I say no; and on the strength of the opinion of these giants in the Senate, I say that they emphatically declare no, and in addition to that I shall quote the figures and make the argument to show that it would not. What I have read is from the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on the resolutions pending in the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman allow me a further question?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does not the gentleman think that this extraordinary claim made by the members of the Senate and by public men with reference to permanent rights in the Hawaiian Islands are rather indicative of an intention to hold on to Pearl Harbor by violence rather than by right? Does he not agree that the provision in the treaty was inserted by the Senate itself, not by joint action of the high contracting powers, and that when the minister of Hawaii addressed a letter to Mr. Bayard, then Secretary of State, informing him that his construction of that clause was terminable with the treaty itself, and when Mr. Bayard concurred in that construction, would it not be a high-handed proceeding on the part of the United States to terminate all the benefits of that treaty as far as Hawaii is concerned and then to claim the only real harbor that Hawaii has?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Well, to answer a lengthy question, I can not assume to interpret the motives and sentiments of the gentlemen who have expressed the opinion and incorporated it in the report. To the second proposition, the opinion of officials of either Government, after the treaty was made and ratified, must subordinate itself to the force and terms of the treaty itself. Third, there can be no outrage against Hawaii, there can be no semblance of injustice, even if by force the United States should maintain her right to Pearl Harbor under the treaty, for the all-sufficient reason, as I shall demonstrate before I am through, that we have paid the Hawaiian people $65,000,000 for Pearl Harbor. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, will the gentleman allow me one further question?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Now, I must have additional time if you make me anticipate what I am going to do.

Great Britain is still pressing for that concession. This treaty arrangement, which is permanent in its character, is a complete demonstration that in this high authority the United States is exercising a right of sovereignty over Hawaii that is utterly inconsistent with the independence of that Government in its relations with the United States.

When that treaty was renewed and extended, in November, 1897, the sovereign grasp of the United States was made firmer and more specific upon the Hawaiian Islands by the stipulation that Pearl Harbor should be in the exclusive possession and control of the United States for the purpose of establishing there a permanent naval station. Such a station, with all needful belongings, including fortifications to protect it, in the exclusive possession of the United States, not only shuts out all foreign powers from the harbor, but places it so entirely under the command of our fleets and guns and our military authority that the Hawaiian Government can not enter Pearl Harbor, even with her commerce, if we choose to exclude her by arbitrary military orders.

Pearl Harbor, in a military sense, will be a fortified base for naval operations that completely dominates all the islands and virtually commands the Pacific Ocean for a distance of more than 2,000 miles in all directions.

Thus it will be seen that all which, in the opinion of the military experts of our Government, was necessary for military purposes in these islands is secured to us by existing treaties. But we are told that a refusal on our part to annex the islands will be equivalent to a relinquishment of these treaty rights and will absolve Hawaii from her obligation to us under them. Here again the answer is found in the treaty. Commercial reciprocity and not political annexation was and is the sole consideration in the treaties for the exclusive commercial and Pearl Harbor concessions, and a breach to authorize abrogation must be a breach of the condition on which the treaty rests. Our refusal to accept the islands into political union with us, offered after the treaties were made and in no wise a part of their consideration, can not in any sense affect the preexisting treaty rights.

Annexationists further object that the treaty by which our exclusive rights in Pearl Harbor are secured may be revoked at the will of either the Hawaiian or our Government after twelve months' notice of such intended action. We contend that the right to terminate the treaty on the part of either Government applies to commercial reciprocity, and not to the grant of exclusive privileges in Pearl Harbor. The Pearl Harbor grant was a surrender of sovereignty from one government to another, and as such is irrevocable, and this Government could, with legal right and with justice, maintain this position; but it is insisted that we would not have the moral right to hold, against so weak a government, this concession, after withholding the benefits which accrue to Hawaii from the commercial clauses of the treaty.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Are you aware of the fact that after the treaty was agreed upon and sent to the city of Washington it was modified in the Senate and returned to Honolulu, and that it was sent back by that Government with the statement that they did not understand there was a permanent cession, and that Secretary of State Bayard, whose letter is on file in the archives of Hawaii, conceded that it was not to continue except during the life of the treaty? Are you aware of the existence of that letter?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. No; I am not.

Mr. BERRY. This treaty was ratified on that. The correspondence, with this letter, is on file. Afterwards, under the express agreement made by the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, it was held that it did not contemplate the existence of the cession of Pearl Harbor beyond the life of the treaty.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. In the trial of a case in any court in this country controlled by legal intelligence, do you not concede from the very facts that you have stated that such collateral matters could not be invoked to modify the terms of the contract?

Mr. BERRY. It has become a part of the correspondence between sovereign powers.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. It has become a part of the correspondence between sovereign powers, but the sovereign treaty-making power does not lie with the Secretary of State of this Government nor that of Hawaii. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. But the point is this—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. I will have to have additional time if I do so.

Mr. HITT. After the treaty was signed the Senate added that clause, that paragraph, and that correspondence exists to-day between the two Governments, before it was promulgated, and Mr. Bayard conceded that it terminated with the treaty, and Mr. Carter asserted the same thing.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. And at last it is nothing more than an agreement between representatives of the Governments who made the treaty after its ratification, and not the treaty-making power.

Mr. HITT. They made that treaty.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. They perhaps negotiated it, but the making of the treaty rested with the President acting by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the declarations of any other official would not be received to explain away what had thus been done.

This contention assumes that we will abandon the treaty, to which I reply that if the treaty was and is an advantageous one to us, the wisdom of the American people may be relied upon to maintain it; and, on the contrary, if we should abandon it, and thereby forfeit to Hawaii the benefits accruing to us from it, it would be only natural to conclude that the American people in their wisdom considered the disadvantages to them from such a treaty greater than its benefits. Or to state the case in the concrete form, if we abandon it, it would be because we thought the remitted duties on Hawaiian products worth more than her reciprocal trade and the military advantages of Pearl Harbor.

But Hawaii might give notice that she would abandon the treaty and reclaim all the privileges, including those of Pearl Harbor, conceded to us by it. The adequate reply to this, however, involves an examination into the motives on the part of the Hawaiians which induced them to enter into the treaty, and an accounting of the benefits which they have derived from its operation, to the end that we may judge whether the people of these islands know a good thing when they see it and have sense enough to hold on to it when once they have it.

Three forces dominate the Hawaiian population—the political force, which is controlled by sugar; the commercial force, supported by sugar, and the moral force, which is animated, as we are assured, by the missionaries, and these missionaries, we are told, are of New England stock. Reviewing classes, there are natives, called Kanakas, numbering some 31,000, who, we are assured, are rapidly dying out. There are Japanese to the number of 24,400, according to the census of 1896, and this class of the population is said to be increasing. There are 15,100 Portuguese, 21,800 Chinese, and a blended population, many of whom, in the judgment of Solomon, would be wise if they knew their own fathers. There are also 8,000 Americans, 2,200 British, 1,400 Germans, 479 Norwegians and French, and 1,055 of all other nationalities.

The islands of the group which they are able to inhabit are only eight in number, and are situated in the Northern Pacific Ocean, more than 2,000 miles from San Francisco, 3,850 miles from Auckland, New Zealand, 4,917 miles from Hongkong, 3,339 miles from Yokohama, Japan, and about 4,500 miles from the Philippines, and have an area, approximately, as great as that of the State of Massachusetts. The climate is described as salubrious, the soil as fertile, the surface mountainous, and the products such as are common to tropical regions. Sugar, coffee, rice, and fruit are produced in greater or less abundance. There are minor details as to volcanoes, lepers, morals, manners, and mountains, which we need not stop to inquire closely into until after annexation. [Laughter and applause.]

This grouping of statistical and other information is made in this connection to throw light on the probable dealing of these people with the existing reciprocity treaty with the United States. The area cultivated with sugar cane in 1896 was, approximately, 80,000 acres, and the export of sugar in 1896 amounted to 221,000 tons. The output of sugar can not be much increased, as most of the sugar lands are already occupied, and to subject the higher lands to cultivation requires an expensive system of irrigation. Prior to the negotiation of the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty, which went into effect in 1876, the commerce of the islands was considerable and was in a languishing condition. Population, exports, imports, and shipping all were steadily decreasing, as the following figures show:

Table showing condition of the Hawaiian trade for six years prior to reciprocity treaty.

Year.	Imports.	Domestic exports.	Customs receipts.	Merchant vessels entered.	Whaling vessels entered.
1890.....	$2,040,000	$1,743,000	$215,000	127	102
1870.....	1,930,000	1,514,000	223,000	159	118
1871.....	1,625,000	1,733,000	221,000	171	47
1872.....	1,746,000	1,402,000	218,000	146	47
1873.....	1,437,000	1,725,000	198,000	100	63
1874.....	1,210,827	1,622,000	183,000	120	43

From the day the reciprocity treaty went into operation the islands' trade increased rapidly, as the following table will show:

Table showing improved condition of Hawaiian trade for the last five years, the result of the reciprocity treaty.

Year.	Imports.	Domestic exports.	Customs receipts.	Merchant vessels entered.
1892.....	$4,634,000	$3,081,000	$494,000	262
1893.....	5,946,000	10,742,000	545,000	315
1894.....	6,625,000	8,581,000	524,000	350
1895.....	5,713,000	8,358,000	547,000	313
1896.....	7,164,000	15,515,000	656,000	386

From which I will repeat that in 1874 their imports were $1,210,827, their domestic exports $1,622,000, and their customs receipts $183,000; and in 1896 their imports were $7,164,000, their domestic exports $15,515,000, and their customs receipts $656,000. As the friends of annexation so persistently point out that 80 per cent of this commerce each way is with the United States, it is easy to see that what has been their great gain must have been to us an equivalent loss, unless the inequality is stayed by the mystic wand of reciprocity.

In this connection I invite attention to the trade balance sheet as it appears in the Monthly Summary of Finance and Commerce of the United States for the month of December, 1897, prepared in the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department of the United States under the title "Trade of the United States with the Hawaiian Islands," from which it appears that the domestic exports from the United States to the Hawaiian Islands from 1877 to 1897, inclusive, amounted to $67,300,921, and the imports from the Hawaiian Islands into the United States for the same period of time amounted to $181,702,609, by which it appears that we bought from the Hawaiian Islands $114,402,688 more of their products than we sold to them in this period of twenty years of reciprocal trade.

This enormous balance of trade against the United States is not the whole story, for, in order to get this opportunity to sell to them, we agreed by the treaty in which the Pearl Harbor rights were conceded to us to admit free of duty certain of their products, the chief of which was sugar, and the amount of remitted duties on sugar and molasses imported into the United States from the Hawaiian Islands from 1877 to 1897, inclusive, aggregates $61,137,408, whereby it appears that we only lacked $6,072,513 of giving by way of remitted duties on sugar and molasses alone as much to the Hawaiian Islands as the total value of all we sold to them in the same period, and the total amount of duties remitted on all imports from Hawaii to the United States for that period of twenty years is $65,468,720, from which it will appear that, contrasting the value of all the domestic products sold to them with the remitted duties on the domestic products bought from them, we lacked $1,721,191 of giving them by way of remitted duties as much as all that we sold them was worth.

Mr. KING. Under that provision we got the goods which we obtained from Hawaii very much cheaper; so that there was no loss to the American people.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Do you suppose so? Let me state the facts. The American people do not get the benefit that is claimed as the result of these remitted duties. They do not get it, in the first place, because when we remitted the duty on sugar it went to the sugar producer, not to the American consumer. You may suggest that as this sugar is largely consumed on the Pacific coast they get it at a reduction in price equivalent to the difference in the freight on sugar brought from the West Indies and across the Continent. Unfortunately that is not true. The fact stands that that difference in freight does not inure to the consumer of sugar, but, on the contrary, it is pocketed by the dealers in sugar, and thus it stands; and the people of the Pacific coast derive no scintilla of benefit or advantage by way of cheaper sugar.

There can be, therefore, no room to doubt who gets the best of this reciprocity bargain, and I have gone into these figures to show that these Hawaiian people, at least the American, British, German, French, and missionary portion, fully understand it. The Kanaka, bothered by his inevitable racial decay and the long-continued absence of his queen in Washir-ton, may not be fully aroused to the splendid advantage got in the deal whereby Pearl Harbor was sold to us for free sugar and free bananas, but it would be an insult to our own blood to suppose that that New England stock of missionaries is in the dark about it. [Laughter and applause.]

It is an injustice to ourselves to imagine that we are ignorant of the results of this treaty to us, for bear in mind the treaty was ratified and went into operation in 1876, remained in operation to 1887, during which period the same ratio of balance against us was being piled up, and yet it was extended in 1897 for a period of seven years, with the Pearl Harbor concession added and with the right to extend it indefinitely beyond that period of limitation, subject only to be revoked after twelve months' notice by either of the contracting parties.

The figures published by the Treasury Department render it impossible to believe that we have continued this treaty for the commercial benefit it has afforded us. It is said that we carry in American ships about 80 per cent of this commerce both ways, and that the banks and business men of the Pacific coast furnish the exchange and sell the goods involved in this trade; and while I am not disposed to interpose in this connection the objection that these banks and these business men and these shipowners are deriving at the expense of the whole people a somewhat unfair advantage, yet I am disposed to remind you that if every dollar they have sold Hawaii in the past twenty years is profit, that their profits are only $1,721,191 more than the duties the entire people have remitted for their benefit.

I am, therefore, disposed to think and to insist, in reply to the contention that we would have no moral or just right to hold Pearl Harbor if the reciprocity treaty were annulled, that we have bought and paid for Pearl Harbor at a cost of $65,500,000, and we should hold it forever without any further concession. To my mind no government that may ever be established in the Hawaiian Islands under the auspices and by the procurement of the sugar interests there, nor any other element of its heterogeneous population, will ever voluntarily renounce the advantages of such a treaty. I am not now concerned with the question that might be suggested by this discussion, as to whether this treaty should or should not stand. I am dealing with the fact that it exists and with the results that flow from it, as they affect the pending question.

Much is claimed for the monopoly of the Hawaiian commerce, which the United States has enjoyed since this treaty went into operation. There is no increase or advantage in our commerce with Hawaii during this period which could not be easily reproduced with any other country under like conditions of reciprocity.

The effect of annexation on the commerce between Hawaii and the United States would add nothing to the revenues of either Government, nor cheapen American products to the Hawaiian consumers, nor would it increase the value of Hawaiian products. If, therefore, we refused annexation but maintained reciprocity, Hawaii would be at no disadvantage commercially compared with her present condition, nor should it be forgotten that the loss of revenue to our Treasury by remitted duties on sugar does not result in any corresponding benefit to the American consumer of sugar by a reduction of the price of Hawaiian sugar in our markets. This benefit accrues to the Hawaiian sugar planter, exclusively.

It is insisted that it is not for the Hawaiian trade alone that annexation is desirable, but that we should become the master of the commerce of the Pacific, and that to do this our merchant marine should have a coaling station, and the proportionately increased navy to protect it should have a naval station on these islands, and that no extensive plan of commercial conquest in the Pacific can ignore these necessities of a successful career. All that I have said as to our rights in Pearl Harbor for a navy applies equally to the merchant marine. The treaty that secures it for the one purpose embraces also the other.

Before leaving the case of the annexationists, I desire to comment on the emergency argument, to catch, if I can, hold and analyze the ghost story with which we are to be frightened into annexation, that if we do not annex Hawaii some other nation will. Hawaii can only be annexed by her consent or against it. Annexation by her consent implies that she will consider it desirable and seek it, and presumably for her material or political advantage, or both, and if for her material advantage, the nation with whom the alliance is sought must do as well or better by her than our commercial reciprocity treaty now results.

Or if for political advantage, she confesses the instability of the Republic, or, deeper still, her incapacity for self-government by any form of political organization. As it is, we pay her for the privilege of giving her what she needs of us. I can hardly believe that any other nation would be disposed to a like sacrificing liberality. If any other power can better protect her than ourselves, then how could we protect her either as our colony or as a sister State of our Union, if such more puissant and ambitious power sought to sever the relations between us. [Applause.]

Hawaii annexed as a State or as a Territory of the United States is not more secure in that relation than the power of our arms on land and sea can make her, and Hawaii as a friendly and independent Government, under theegis of our protection, could not be conquered till we ourselves were conquered, and if the power existed to conquer us neither alliance nor annexation could increase our resistance or her security. [Applause.] The power of Cuba or of Puerto Rico, offensive or defensive, is the power of Spain, and the power of Jamaica is but the power of Great Britain.

It has transpired in the history of this question that Germany was reputed to desire our missionary protégé, at another time that France would make her a French post in the Pacific, and still at another that Great Britain was anxious to thicken her chain of forts and coaling stations around the globe, and the ghost of these mighty powers have been made to flit with threatening menace across our vision. But these islands still stand commercially betrothed to the great Republic. The growing power of Japan in the Pacific Ocean is the new bogey, and is upheld as a menace to our permanent power in the affairs of Hawaii, and as if to add terror to the threat, Japan is called the "England of the Pacific." If Japan was even Britain herself and cherished the purposes ascribed to her, she would acknowledge with complacency the rightfulness of our dominion over Hawaii. What England has acknowledged, Japan may well content herself with as settled.

What France has acknowledged she will be wise not to controvert, and while youth is not synonymous with discretion, diplomacy, which is an aid to reflection, usually precedes war. If the fear, which is now so freely expressed, of European domination in the Pacific as an argument is really deceiving those who profess its feeling, what of this fact? In 1887 we secured the exclusive right by treaty to possess, improve, and fortify Pearl Harbor. We were told by General Schofield in 1873, in the report to which I have heretofore referred:

It is to be observed that if the United States are ever to have a harbor of refuge and naval station in the Hawaiian Islands in the event of war, the harbor must be prepared in advance by the removal of the Pearl River bar.

When war has begun it will be too late to make this harbor available, and there is no other suitable harbor on these islands.

By the voice of this authority you were warned of your necessities in the Pacific. By the force of his opinion you were urged to prepare before the emergency arose. The naval and military experts who warned you then are those whose warning you quote now. The sagacity of your diplomats of to-day foresee no advantage, foretell no danger, that Adams, Webster, Everett, Marcy, Seward, Fish, Evarts, Foster, and Blaine did not each in his turn reiterate till they burnt it into the American brain with the brand of the Monroe doctrine, that we would not permit the acquisition of these islands by any other nation, and on the 7th of February, 1894, the House of Representatives of the United States declared by resolution:

RESOLUTION OF UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 7, 1894.

Resolved, * * * That foreign intervention in the political affairs of the [Hawaiian] Islands will not be regarded with indifference by the Government of the United States.—Congressional Record, Fifty-third Congress, second session, page 2001.

And on the 31st of May of the same year the United States Senate declared by resolution:

RESOLUTION OF UNITED STATES SENATE, MAY 31, 1894.

Resolved, That * * * any intervention in the political affairs of these islands [Hawaii] by any other government will be regarded as an act unfriendly to the United States.—Congressional Record, Fifty-third Congress, second session, page 5499.

Yet, professing this fear, you have not to this good day dug a foot into the coral reef that girds and guards Pearl Harbor; you have never planted there a cannon in the assertion of your rights or to allay your pretended fears, when for less money by half than would build a battle ship you could make of Pearl Harbor a "Gibraltar." Why not? Will you answer, because the battle of the Yalu had not been fought, and the blood-stained foam of the Yellow Sea had not christened the birth of the "England of the Pacific"? You profess to be in fear of your security by a new-born power into the naval world, 6,000 miles from your shores, whose imagined prowess is the outcome of a victory over an unequal foe, while Great Britain, mistress of the seas for a hundred years, bounds you on the north from ocean to ocean with the Dominion of Canada and sentinels your eastern coast from Halifax to Jamaica. [Applause.]

I have consumed more time than was intended should be occupied by me.

Several MEMBERS. Go ahead.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. Great stress has been laid on the character of our diplomatic relations with Hawaii to justify annexation. Liberal quotations from the correspondence between our State Department and our representatives at Honolulu have been made, beginning with the letter of instructions of Mr. Webster to Commissioner Brown in 1853. In the first place, it is only by indirection that the attitude of the State Department can be said to represent the popular will on a given question; but waiving this criticism, I affirm that close study of our diplomatic relations will not reveal any purpose on the part of our Government other than the exclusion of every other nation from dominion over Hawaiian affairs, and that the resolutions passed by Congress in 1894 expressed the full measure of the popular will in reference to these islands.

The diplomatic correspondence does show persistent agitation for annexation. It reveals that the majority of our diplomatic representatives to these islands have espoused the cause of annexation, and have repeatedly urged it upon this Government, to be as repeatedly declined, until the Administration of President Harrison. Much of this correspondence is still further employed in reporting to our Government the classes of persons and the kinds of agricultural and commercial interests in the islands who favored, from time to time, and as their interests dictated, reciprocity treaties, political protectorates, and annexation.

Not only this, but our Government has been advised of the schemes and machinations to bring to pass reciprocal trade relations and annexation. The existing Dole Government is but the consummation of a revolutionary scheme projected thirty years ago and fostered and made triumphant by the sugar interest in these island and their abettors. That Government, in the light of its history, may be aptly described as a government of sugar, for sugar, and by sugar [laughter and applause], and its foster parent is the Boston Annexation Society, which was in existence thirty years ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Gather the souls of the heathen to God and the profit to themselves.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. The surest guide to the attitude of the United States toward the Hawaiian Islands is to be found in the official utterances of our Government and in the declaration of Congress on that subject, and that the annexation of the Sandwich Islands was never the policy of our Government nor of any political party of our country from the earliest diplomatic relations down to the Administration of President Harrison is abundantly proven by the official utterances of the Government. That we have often been tempted and in many ways is no doubt true, but it is equally beyond contradiction that the Administration of President Harrison is the first and the present Administration is the second in the history of this question to have yielded to the tempter the traditional policy of Washington and Jefferson. [Applause.]

For proof of this I shall cite our history. In the message which President Tyler sent to Congress December 30, 1842, the following pertinent passage occurs:

Owing to their locality and to the course of the winds which prevail in this quarter of the world the Sandwich Islands are the stopping place for almost all vessels passing from continent to continent across the Pacific Ocean. They are especially resorted to by a great number of vessels of the United States which are engaged in the whale fishery in those seas.

It can not but be in conformity with the interest and wishes of the Government and the people of the United States that this community thus existing in the midst of a vast expanse of ocean should be respected and all its rights strictly and conscientiously regarded. And this must also be the true interest of all other commercial states. Far remote from the dominions of European powers, its growth and prosperity as an independent state may yet be in a high degree useful to all whose trade is extended to those regions, while its near approach to this continent, and the intercourse which American vessels have with it—such vessels constituting five-sixths of all which annually visit it—could not but create dissatisfaction on the part of the United States at any attempt by another power, should such attempt be threatened or feared, to take possession of the islands, colonize them, and subvert the native Government.

Considering, therefore, that the United States possesses so very large a share of the intercourse with those islands, it is deemed not unfit to make the declaration that their Government seeks, nevertheless, no peculiar advantages, no exclusive control over the Hawaiian Government, but is content with its independent existence, and anxiously wishes for its security and prosperity. Its forbearance in this respect, under the circumstances of the very large intercourse of their citizens with the islands, would justify the Government, should events hereafter arise to require it, in making a decided remonstrance against the adoption of an opposite policy by any other power.

Here we have the fullest recognition of the commercial importance of these islands in their relation to the commerce of the Pacific, a statement that five-sixths of the vessels annually visiting the islands being American, a recognition of the rivalry of the great powers of Great Britain and France with ourselves for commercial supremacy in the Pacific; and yet with this clear insight of existing conditions and as clear foresight of future conditions, not only is annexation not encouraged, but a fixed boundary solemnly set up whereby the policy of this Government is marked out to be the maintenance of these islands independent of foreign as well as American political control; and while with the extension and sharper rivalry of their commerce, both France and Great Britain sought the acquisition of these islands and by their aggression jeopardized their independence and by their encroachment rendered the fate of the Sandwich Islands a matter of solicitude, which seriously engaged the attention of our statesmen, the sequel shows that France and England were beaten back and our own commercial supremacy maintained and the independence of the islands made sure by our guaranty against European dominion.

In 1851 France made demands on the Hawaiian Government which this Government felt called upon to resent and resist, and Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, in his official letter to Luther Severance, our representative at Honolulu, wrote:

The Hawaiian Islands are ten times nearer to the United States than to any of the powers of Europe. Five-sixths of all their commercial intercourse is with the United States, and these considerations, together with others of a more general character, have fixed the course which the Government of the United States will pursue in regard to them.

The announcement of this policy will not surprise the governments of Europe, nor be thought to be unreasonable by the nations of the civilized world, and that policy is that while the Government of the United States, itself faithful to its original assurance, scrupulously regards the independence of the Hawaiian Islands, it can never consent to see those islands taken possession of by either of the great commercial powers of Europe, nor can it consent that demands, manifestly unjust and derogatory and inconsistent with a bona fide independence, shall be enforced against that Government.

Growing out of the aggressions of the French in Honolulu, in 1851 the King of the Hawaiian Islands invoked the protection of the United States, and to enable our Government to exercise this power without an apparent violation of its own policy of maintaining the independence of the islands the subterfuge of a contingent surrender by the Government of the islands of their sovereignty to the United States, or of their annexation to this country, was accepted by our minister there, Mr. Severance, and when this fact was made known by Mr. Severance to Mr. Webster, Mr. Webster in a letter dated July 14, 1851, said:

The act of contingent or conditional surrender, which you mentioned in your letter as having been placed in your hands, you will please return to the Hawaiian Government. You will see by my official letter, which you are at liberty to communicate to that Government, the disposition of the United States to maintain its independence; beyond that you will not proceed. You inform us that many American citizens have gone to settle in the islands; if so, they have ceased to be American citizens. The Government of the United States must of course feel an interest in them not extended to foreigners, but by the law of nations they have no right further to demand the protection of this Government. Whatever aid or protection might under any circumstances be given them must be given, not as a matter of right on their part, but in consistency with the general policy and duty of the Government and its relations with friendly powers.

You will, therefore, not encourage in them, nor, indeed, in any others, any idea or expectation that the islands will become annexed to the United States.

Thus it is clear that up to this point our policy toward Hawaii had undergone no change. In 1854 a revival of British and French aggressions upon the islands in the form of a naval demonstration, together with the persistent effort of American residents in the islands, precipitated anew the question of annexation to the United States, and the correspondence of Mr. Gregg, as the minister to Hawaii, with Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, very clearly portrays the influences by which the reigning King was induced to negotiate a treaty of annexation in 1854.

This treaty was based on the representations that the islands would fall into the hands of France or Great Britain, and to prevent it the idea of cession, which was advanced in 1851, was revived in the form of a treaty. The King who authorized this treaty died before its ratification, and his successor to the Hawaiian throne repudiated it. This chapter in the history of the question shows the first attempt at a modification of the policy of the United States, and it can not be better stated than by quoting the language of Mr. Marcy to Mr. Gregg, in a letter of January 31, 1855, in which he said:

The policy of the United States in relation to the future of the Sandwich Islands is presented in the instructions heretofore given to you. That policy is not to accelerate or urge on any important change in the government of that country, but if it has or should become so far enfeebled that it can not be continued, and the sovereignty of the islands must be transferred to another power, then a state of things will exist in which it will be proper for the United States to have a regard to the future condition of that country.

Here the question of annexation was made to turn, not on the increasing interest of Americans in the islands, nor upon the mere will of the Government of the islands itself, but solely upon the condition that the Government should become so enfeebled as to be unable to resist falling into the hands of some other foreign power.

In 1863, beginning with the career of Mr. McBride as minister to Hawaii, the question of annexation was begun and urgently pressed upon the attention of our Government, alternating with propositions for treaties for reciprocity, until Mr. Seward, President Lincoln's Secretary of State, repressed it by an emphatic refusal to consider it. It will not be out of place at this juncture to throw some light on the sources, character, and motives of this agitation in the islands for annexation. In the letter from Mr. McBride to Mr. Seward dated October 9, 1863, speaking of a debt of $90,000 loaned by an Englishman to the Hawaiian Government, he said:

The payment of this debt by the United States, and if need be the loan of a half million more, together with presents both ornamental and useful to their majesties and to the heir apparent, cautiously and wisely bestowed, might be the means of giving Americans the vantage ground in point of court influence and other interests which may come up in the future.

I beg leave to further say that American interests greatly predominate here over all others combined, and not less than four-fifths of the commerce connected with these islands is American. The merchants, traders, dealers of all kinds, and planters are principally Americans. The capacity of these islands for growing sugar cane is of world-wide celebrity, and is known not to be inferior to that of any other country. All the sugar plantations of any note on these islands, with the exception of two or three, belong to Americans.

Again, in the letter of Mr. McCook, then minister to the islands, to Mr. Seward, dated September 3, 1866, this additional light is thrown on the question of annexation:

Many of the American residents have rendered themselves obnoxious to the King and his cabinet by personal abuse of the ministers and unwarranted interference in the political affairs of the Kingdom. The natural result of this has been dislike, freely expressed, on both sides. • • • Another class of Americans, the missionaries, have controlled the political affairs of the country since 1820. They are dissatisfied because within the last few years they have lost their hold upon the Government and its offices.

The first class of Americans are generally disappointed adventurers, the second class are religionists, who, having once exercised supreme power in church and state, feel all the bitterness of disappointment at seeing their political power pass into other hands and knowing that the native population is beginning to listen to a religion preached from other pulpits than their own. The American missionaries have undoubtedly labored faithfully; but it is their own fault if, after forty years experience as keepers of the conscience to the natives and their princes, they permit themselves to be driven from the field by an adroit English priest, whose church is a mere political machine, and who possesses apparently neither the intelligence nor the virtue of his more experienced and Puritanical brother missionaries.

In the same letter Mr. McCook said:

There is still another class—the planters of the country. They are nearly all Americans, both in nationality and sympathy; they are the better class of the residents of the islands, possess its substantial wealth, control its resources, and annually ship 20,000,000 pounds of sugar to the Pacific coast of the United States. Their pecuniary interests, their political sympathies, their business relations, and their personal attachments are all with the United States and its citizens.

The health of the present King is most precarious. When he dies the race of Hawaiian kings dies with him, and I feel confident that he will not name a successor.

And when this dynasty ends, as end it will probably within the next year, I am sure that if the American Government indicates the slightest desire to test in these islands the last Napoleonic conception in the way of territorial extension, you will find the people here, with great unanimity, "demanding by votes, freely expressed, annexation to the United States."

In 1867 Secretary Seward sent as the confidential agent of the State Department Mr. Z. S. Spalding to Honolulu to study the effect the reciprocity treaty would have on the future relations of the United States and Hawaii. Mr. Spalding reported adversely to the reciprocity treaty, on the ground that he thought it would impede or prevent annexation of that country in the near future, and advocated and suggested to Mr. Seward the policy of annexation.

Mr. Spalding, after the treaty of reciprocity, which he opposed, was ratified, bought 25,000 acres of land in the islands and engaged in the manufacture of sugar cane into sugar, and was one of the largest producers of sugar in the islands. To the advice of Mr. Spalding Mr. Seward made the following reply on July 5, 1868:

SIR: Your letter of the 14th of April has been received and carefully read. The information which you give of the excitement which is prevailing in Honolulu in regard to the annexation of the Sandwich Islands is very interesting. You suggest a system of proceeding here with reference to that object which could not possibly at the present time obtain the sanction of any department of this Government. * * *

The public mind refuses to dismiss questions growing out of the civil war, even so far as to entertain the higher but more remote questions of national extension and aggrandizement. Each of the political parties seems to suppose that economy and retrenchment will be prevailing considerations in that election, and the leaders of each party, therefore, seem to shrink from every suggestion which may involve any new national enterprise, and especially any foreign one. How long sentiments of this sort may control the proceedings of the Government is uncertain, but in the meantime it will be well for you not to allow extravagant expectations of sympathy between the United States and the friends of annexation in the islands to influence your own conduct.

Thus, as far down as 1868, we have the repeated and distinct repudiation of annexation on its merits, but the question could not be put down. Our missionaries and our sugar planters were determined to deliver the islands into the hands of the American people whenever an Administration could be found which would receive them, and thus, on April 14, 1869, Mr. Spalding's son, writing from Honolulu to his father, said:

Our latest advices, by the Idaho, seemed to convey the idea that the reciprocity treaty is beyond hope, and the effect is beginning to be generally felt and seen. Men who have kept silent for months, guarding their words and actions, have openly expressed themselves of late as being in favor of annexation, and begun to talk of forming an organization or party with that end in view.

What they want is to know that they will be backed up by the United States and its representatives here in all proper measures taken by them to secure a change in the political sentiment of the islands and their annexation at the earliest possible period. * * * The Hawaiian Club, of Boston, write that the treaty is undoubtedly dead and that although they never favored annexation heretofore they do so now. * * * There are many good men who will come out boldly for annexation and strain every nerve for its success if they can be satisfied that the United States will help them through.

The reciprocity treaty just as completely tied Minister McCook's hands as did the Hawaiian minister of foreign relations bind our commissioner, Mr. Gregg, by getting him in his debt. The ministers of this Government never wanted "reciprocity" or any other connection with the United States, but they entertained the subject to quiet the demand for annexation, intending to kill it in the end. They have either hamboozled or bought up our representatives before General McCook, and he they allowed to run wild on reciprocity. * * * The American party here is composed of men mostly from the New England States.

On February 17, 1873, Henry A. Pierce, then our representative at Honolulu, wrote the Hon. Hamilton Fish, then Secretary of State:

Should the great interests of the country, however, demand that "annexation" shall be attempted, the planters, merchants, and foreigners generally will induce the people to overthrow the Government, establish a republic, and then ask the United States for admittance into its Union.

Here we have the prophecy which finds its fulfillment in the conditions of this debate on the resolutions for the annexation of Hawaii. Mr. Pierce advised as feasible what Mr. Spalding condemned.

Mr. Seward had killed the hopes of annexation, and in its stead the reciprocity treaty grew in strength until it was consummated in 1874, and under its provisions I have pointed out the effect on Hawaiian commerce and the sugar industry, how the Pearl Harbor concession was ingrafted on its renewal in 1887; and this history brings us to the Administration of President Harrison. In the meantime the sugar interests grew and waxed strong, but it lacked that thorough intrenchment in the favoritism of a strong government, which would foster to its greatest possibilities the power of monopoly in its control, and hence we are brought to the final chapter that resulted in the overthrow of the Monarchy, the establishment of the Dole Government, and the tender of the islands to become American soil.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield to the gentleman such time as he wants.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. I feel constrained not to accept the courtesy extended to me by the gentleman from Arkansas, because it means necessarily a denial to other gentlemen who desire to speak of an opportunity to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman need not concern himself about that. I have twenty minutes coming to me, and I will yield a part or the whole of it to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. We want the benefit of the rest of that speech, and do not want to hunt it up in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope that every member who is absent and the jingo press will read it prayerfully.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. The benefits derived by the sugar planters in the islands from reciprocity were so vast that it resulted in the open formation of an annexation party in the islands, because a commercial advantage which was limited in duration by the terms of a treaty should, if possible, be made permanent by annexation, and however much annexationists concealed their desire before the treaty, and however stealthily it had been sought to be accomplished, the mask was now thrown off and their purposes generally known.

American ministers, forsaking the prudence of concealing their personal beliefs, openly countenanced schemes for annexation, and in the revolution of 1893, when Liliuokalani was dethroned and the provisional government, which was later succeeded by the Dole Government, begun the administration of the affairs, it was with the American flag transferred from our war ship in the harbor of Honolulu and raised on the islands, and American marines left the decks of the Boston for the streets of Honolulu, where, under the command of American officers and by the direction of an American minister, they stood guard over the interests of the provisional government, which had established itself by revolution.

So flagrant was this conduct of our minister that the treaty of annexation, which the Republic adopted and which the President submitted to the Senate for ratification, was withdrawn from the Senate by Mr. Cleveland, who succeeded Mr. Harrison to the Presidency, and the Senate ordered an investigation of the conduct of our minister and our naval forces as they related to the establishment of the new government. The result of this investigation, at least, contributed to the decision of President Cleveland to reject the treaty, and thus ended the question during his Administration.

And, as an expression of the mind of the American people through their representatives in Congress, was passed in 1894 the resolutions to which I have previously alluded, thus again giving expression in this instance by the people through their representatives rather than the executive department of our Government to that policy which declared for the independence of the islands of all foreign interference or domination.

This expression of policy was made a plank in the platform on which Mr. McKinley was elected President, and the negotiation by him of the pending treaty of annexation and its submission to the Senate of the United States, and the present consideration of the pending resolutions, which in effect embrace the terms of the treaty, and which are introduced and urged to passage solely because the treaty can not command the requisite two-thirds majority of the Senate for its ratification, violates the policy of this Government from the Administration of President Tyler and the will of the American people to the moment of the declaration of war with Spain.

It will hardly be denied that up to the victory of Dewey at Manila there was no reasonable hope for the annexation of these islands by this Government, and the argument from the standpoint of American annexationists is augmented by the alleged necessity of owning Hawaii to defend the Philippines. In other words, it is a practical application of the argument theoretically advanced of the strategical importance of the islands for naval purposes.

The argument favoring annexation from the Hawaiian standpoint remains the same, and while I have heretofore characterized it as the scheme of those who control sugar-producing interests of the islands, I will add in support of this the testimony of Mr. Z. S. Spalding, who was a witness before the Senate investigating committee in 1894, already alluded to. Referring to the time of his testifying in 1894, Mr. Spalding said:

That the total value of investments of American citizens in the Hawaiian Islands was anywhere from thirty to fifty million dollars. Thirty millions under the conditions then existing he considered to be worth fifty millions if these conditions were improved. When the price of sugar goes down, as it is now, our plantations are valueless as producers of revenue. Last year we received as high as 44 cents per pound for sugar. That was the market price. This year it is down to 2 1/2 cents per pound. Hawaii is not a sugar country, and with all our advantages—and we have given more thought to the business and developed it to a higher scientific degree than any other sugar country known—at the same time I am quite confident that with all those advantages with capital I could go to the Island of Cuba and with my knowledge of the sugar business I could produce sugar for $10 per ton, half a cent cheaper than in Hawaii.

Hence I do not regard Hawaii as a sugar country a valuable country. We would not have arrived at the point we are now except for the benefits of the reciprocity treaty. We received great encouragement from that—received what you might term a large bonus from the United States, and the money received was put in these plantations to build them up. * * * I do not think that there are any advantages except the climate. I saw advantage in the reciprocity treaty, and I would not have stayed there had it not been for reciprocity, because before the reciprocity treaty had passed all the plantations had gone through bankruptcy. I do not think there was a single plantation that had not gone into bankruptcy. * * *

If it is not desirable for the United States to hold Pearl River, if it is not desirable for the United States to have that country as an outpost, it is not worth while for them to have anything to do with the country, because as an agricultural country, mineral, mercantile, or manufacturing, it is of small value.

Further, in illustration of the benefits annexation would afford, Mr. Spalding said:

If we have a powerful Government to back us, we get rid of a large proportion of the expenses of the present form of government and the expenses of the last government, the monarchical government.

When it is borne in mind that Mr. Spalding is the second largest sugar producer in the islands, is himself an American, and states that nine-tenths of all the property in Hawaii is owned by the white population and that Americans own over three-fourths of the whole property, he is no inferior witness on the question about which he has testified.

My purpose in this argument has been to trace out and lay bare the purposes and motives which moved the Hawaiians to desire annexation, and to render clear the interests and motives of the annexationists from the standpoint of the United States, believing that with the motive clear, the argument may be better weighed.

I have admitted for the sake of argument the full contention of those who insist on the importance of Hawaii as a coaling station, and I will not deny that it possesses some value as such; but let us see to what extent it is valuable as a coaling station, either for commercial or naval purposes. In the first place, no coal has ever been discovered in the islands nor does their formation indicate that any coal exists there, and coal for any purpose which is taken on there must be brought to the islands, and it is shipped to them from Australia, China, Japan, Canada, or the United States, with the result that for commercial purposes it would not be much used because of the great cost of it, and for naval purposes in time of war it must either be stored in advance of war or the transportation of it after war is declared would be subject to all the hazards of war.

The great existing lines of commerce in the Pacific are apt to remain as they are. From the Pacific side of North America we have Vancouver, Portland, San Francisco, and San Diego, which must necessarily retain their prominence as seaports, because, besides their excellent harbors, they are the termini of the four great transcontinental railways, and from either of these ports to China, Japan, or India the steamship routes lie well north or south of Hawaii, varying from 500 to 1,200 miles, and for these ships to deflect from the direct course to touch at Hawaii, resulting in lengthening their passage from two to five days, there must be some compensating advantage.

In freight and passenger transportation time is money; and if the commerce of these islands is not sufficiently important to attract these great lines to swerve from their course to pick it up, then they could only be expected to touch there for the advantage of recoaling. Now the ships which leave Vancouver and Puget Sound, San Francisco, or San Diego could purchase coal cheaper at either of these original supply points than they possibly could at Honolulu, and therefore no merchant ship would do this unless her own coal capacity was insufficient for an unbroken trans-Pacific voyage, and this contingency in the argument is met by the fact that the ships now built for these great transportation companies are provided with a coal capacity sufficient for a continuous journey, and for the well-understood reason that it is cheaper to displace freight for a sufficient coal supply to accomplish a continuous passage than to fill that space with freight and suffer the loss of delay necessary to recoal at Honolulu. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will state to the gentleman that Admiral Walker, in his testimony before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, said that very few vessels trading with China do touch here.

Mr. HOWARD of Georgia. The fact that ships do make the deflection and call at Honolulu is explained by the fact that mail subsidies warrant the sacrifice; that most of them do not, proves the fact that it is not profitable to do so.

The idea prevalent in our minds that Hawaii is at the "cross-roads of the Pacific" comes from the days of sailing ships, when the course of this class of vessels was determined by winds and tides, and it is a fact that the winds and currents of the Northern Pacific are such as to favor navigation in the vicinity of these islands; then, too, in the days of sailing ships the fresh-water supply had to be taken in port. Now the steam vessel supplies herself by condensation of sea water. There is little favoritism in business, and the currents in which it now flows are those which are regulated by profit and not sentiment, and to transfer to Hawaii the American flag will change no existing Pacific route.

Now, further, as to the necessity for a naval coaling station. In times of peace no problem of advantage or disadvantage is presented, and in times of war every naval power of the world has possessions in the Pacific. In going into the Pacific for a naval station, either for the better defense of our Pacific coast or annexing Hawaii as a necessary protection for the Philippines, we run into a hornet's nest.

Japan, producing her own coal and with her own ports and possessions extending as far south as Formosa, within 600 miles of Manila; Great Britain at Wei-hai-wei, Hongkong, the Straits Settlements, North Borneo, Southern New Guinea, Australia, Gilbert Islands, Fiji Islands, and the Cook Islands; France at Annam, and in the Southern Pacific the Loyalty Islands and the Society Islands; and Germany at Hachow in the Yellow Sea, at New Guinea in the Southern Pacific, Marshall Islands, Admiralty Islands, and the Solomon Islands, none of which are so near our shores as Hawaii, none of which, perhaps, affording such impregnable harbors as Pearl River, but all of them brought 2,000 miles nearer to our outposts with Hawaii annexed to us than they now are, and all of them capable of storing coal for a fleet.

I am aware that the naval experts say that it is impracticable to coal at sea, but I am further aware that Sampson and Schley have been coaling at sea within 1,200 miles of Key West for the past two weeks. Coaling at sea is no doubt both difficult and hazardous, but if it can be accomplished at all, it then becomes a relative difficulty only.

If it is said that these observations are pertinent only to existing conditions, but that by cutting the Nicaragua Canal, thereby changing the routes of commerce and altering the conditions for its protection, we should then doubly need Hawaii for its protection, I ask, Why protect from the Pacific side at a distance of 3,600 miles, when on the Atlantic side and at the very mouth of the canal stands Great Britain at the Bahamas, Balize, Jamaica, Antigua, Trinidad, Barbados, and Bermuda; France at Guadeloupe and Martinique, making the Caribbean a closed sea, and shutting the Gulf of Mexico off from the Atlantic? Annexationists who profess to believe that we should have the Hawaiian group in order to render Pearl Harbor available as a "Gibraltar" would by like reasoning insist that Great Britain should own Spain and Portugal to make Gibraltar available.

I am opposed to the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands because I believe that the Government which tenders them to us does so in violation of the will of the masses of the people. I am opposed to it because I believe that the introduction of that heterogeneous population is not a desirable addition to our population. It is no reply to say that annually we have taken into the United States immigrants exceeding in number the entire population of the islands and of as many distinct and different types as exist there, because in the case of immigration to the United States the immigrants are absorbed by diffusion throughout the mass of 70,000,000 people, and their identity is as completely lost as the waters of the Mississippi as they empty into the Gulf.

At Hawaii these people will remain surrounded by the conditions that to-day surround them, addicted to habits, social, moral, religious, and political, which to-day characterize them, and there they will remain to stagnate as the waters of the Dead Sea.

I am opposed to annexation because, while annexed as a Territory, it will eventually seek and acquire statehood. The influences which have made annexation possible will make statehood equally certain.

We shall not be able to resist the demand. We were ourselves at the beginning the colonies of Great Britain, and because we resisted the right to tax without representation we became free States and a powerful republic. Taxation without representation to the American mind means revolution, and it is as well to view the annexation of these islands in the beginning in the light of statehood, and from this view it can but add to our troubles to annex them.

Already within our borders are we unfortunately divided into cotton States, silver States, manufacturing States, wheat States, grazing States, whose divergent interests, clamoring for recognition in Congress, add to the problems of self-government. The annexation of Hawaii means the addition of a sugar State, and its sugar must have either tariff or bounty protection. Protected industries feed on the great body of the people and sap rather than build up their strength; they fatten the individual and famish the masses.

I am in favor of the extension of our commerce, but I do not regard commercial extension as synonymous with territorial aggrandizement. So far as our commerce with these islands is concerned, I have quoted enough of the opinions of those who are competent to speak, and shown by the statistics of our foreign trade that the balance sheet of Hawaiian trade is against us. The war with Spain has infused a spirit of territorial aggrandizement that is the support of this movement for Hawaiian annexation.

There are those who, infatuated with the example of European powers, are impatient to tread in their footsteps. They admit that it is a wide digression from our history and traditional policies; they concede that the wisdom of our fathers was sufficient for the times in which they lived, but falls short of the necessities of the present, and if adhered to will dwarf our expansion in the future. For my part, I can not agree that this spirit is either in itself wise or the legitimate outcome of the conditions which will confront us resulting from the war with Spain.

We may know more of the uses of steam, electricity, stock gambling, and trusts than the framers of the Constitution, but in no essential principle of a democratic form of government are we any wiser than they. We have forbidden slavery which they permitted, and thereby enlarged the class who shall enjoy the blessings of freedom, but we have added no new attribute to freedom.

On the whole, it may be said that we have administered the Government we inherited with the wisdom which justifies the right of self-government. That we are living out successfully the plan of government formed for us does not imply that we are wiser than they who planned it, and, planning, first administered it. This proposition of annexation is not only hurtful in itself but is the forerunner of a policy of colonial empire which challenges the wisdom of the past and bids the American people abandon their traditions and build their future from new plans copied from the war charts of the monarchies of Europe and Asia.

You can not build a lasting commerce on conquest, nor can you maintain by force an empire of alien races scattered over the globe. We have excluded the Chinese from our shores, and the agitation has almost ripened into law to prevent the further immigration of the poor and the ignorant of Europe. The policy of exclusion which these acts indicate is inconsistent with any theory of territorial expansion which embraces the alien races of the Pacific.

England and France and Germany may plausibly find a pretext for their experiment in extraterritorial empires. They are densely populated and stand in need of homes for their surplus population. On the other hand, our area and present population compared with theirs, we are not one-fourth full. In their system of colonial governments, supported by vast standing armies and navies and administered by a system of colonial officials, trained in such service and maintained in authority by the strength of centralized power, are conditions which we could not imitate without the overthrow of cherished and fundamental principles of our own system of popular and free government.

The object of this dream is commercial expansion, but, I repeat, it can not be obtained in this way. If we conquer the markets of the world, it must be by the competition of quality and price. Undertake a colonial system as an aid to commerce and those colonies upon whom you force your wares by law will harass you with rebellion as surely as the tea tax started one in Boston Harbor. Spain in her effort to derive support by force from her colonies presents one problem of colonial government which our own armies in the field and our fleet on the seas give the solution.

I favor as earnestly as any man can the legitimate extension of our commerce. I am not unmindful that the excessive production of our fields and our factories must have an outlet. And I have full faith that the productiveness of our soil, the energy, intelligence, and skill of our people, can successfully compete for the prize of commercial supremacy if the conditions of production, manufacture, and transportation are unhindered by unwise laws. But you can not build up a foreign commerce for manufactures under a system which makes your home market the dearest in the world.

The best expression of the purposes for which our Government was formed is to be found in the preamble of the Constitution upon which it rests, and by that it was declared that—

The people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

We are organized for these and no other purposes, and elastic as has become the idea of "general welfare," it is difficult for me to conceive that the framers of this Constitution, fresh from the victories of independence of British tyranny, could have had it in contemplation that one purpose of the Government (they were forming) should be to engage at any period of its history in a scheme of colonial empire. Their minds were consecrated by the blood of the Revolution to the idol of liberty, and perish in shame the lust of power and the greed of wealth that would prostitute their idol.

We have advanced far since the birth of the Republic, but it is worth the inquiry whether, in the science of self-government, we have passed the wisdom of our fathers. In the arts and sciences the nineteenth century is unparalleled in its achievements; but at last the measure of it all may be found in the Patent Office. Human nature remains the same, and with this the science of self-government deals. For me and for my people the wisdom of Washington and of Jefferson shall be the lamp by which our feet are guided, and in this moment of its apparent obscurity in the minds of many of us let it shine as a pillar of cloud and of fire. Washington, in his Farewell Address, said:

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary viciissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient Government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

Supplementing this, Jefferson, in his inaugural address in 1801, laid down the following rule of action:

"Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none."

[Loud applause.]

Handy, I designated to continue the work as special commissioner, under the act of Congress approved July 19, 1897, in relation to the acceptance by the Government of the United States of the invitation of France to participate in the international exposition to be held at Paris from April 15 to November 5, 1900.

I cordially renew my recommendation that a liberal appropriation be immediately granted.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

Washington, June 15, 1898.

HAWAII.

Mr. HITT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, let me say at the very beginning of my remarks that it is a matter of great personal regret to me that from sincere convictions I am compelled to differ on this momentous question of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands with some of my Democratic colleagues for whose judgment and opinions I have great respect. I had indulged the hope that on this question we would stand as a unit in favor of the policy of annexation.

At the same time I desire to say that it is a matter of great personal gratification to me that at last the important question of annexing the Sandwich Islands is before the House of Representatives for final determination; that at last something is going to be done about this very important matter; that at last the people will be heard on this question through their representatives in this House.

The question of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is one in which I take a very deep interest, and I have given some study and some thought to the matter. For many years I have been a consistent and an ardent advocate of the annexation of these Pacific islands. They should have been annexed long ago. There is no good reason why they should not be annexed now. And I congratulate this House and the country upon the fact that they soon will be annexed, forever to remain under the American flag.

Mr. Speaker, I favor these resolutions and shall vote for them with all my heart, because I believe, after careful investigation, that the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to this country at this time is essential, both from a military and a commercial standpoint, to our supremacy on the Pacific Ocean. In my judgment, the Hawaiian Islands are the key to the Pacific and are, and of right ought to be, a part of the sovereign territory of the United States. Their acquisition is absolutely necessary for the protection of our great Pacific coast line.

In this respect they constitute the sentinel of the North Pacific, and to us a Gibraltar indispensable for the protection of our Pacific coast. All our great naval and military authorities say this, and there can be no doubt about it in the opinion of any person who will give the question investigation and due consideration. Our possession of these islands will give us a strategical position in the Pacific that will always be an incomparable advantage in case of trouble. It is well known that the Pacific is so wide that war vessels can not cross it from any foreign naval station to our shores without recoaling, and there is no place to recoal in all the Pacific but Hawaii. The exclusion of foreign countries from Hawaii will practically protect our Pacific coast from trans-Pacific attack. And no less an authority than Captain Mahan has said that the possession of these islands by the United States is a military necessity; that no greater navy would be needed for the defense of our Pacific coast than would be required with the islands unannexed, and with them annexed the advantage would be entirely with us. This opinion is concurred in, I believe, by all our naval and military authorities.

To-day we are confronted with this situation: The people of the Hawaiian Islands through their duly elected officers petition us for annexation. They have a little Republic away out there on the Pacific, and they believe they should become, and they want to become, a part of the great Republic of the United States. They ask us to take them under the protection of the Stars and Stripes. They give us everything. Shall we accept the magnificent gift they offer or shall we refuse it? Looking at this question from every standpoint, I say for one we should accept. Why should we hesitate? Why should we not welcome them to the protection of the great Republic?

If we accept them, there is no nation on earth that can or will object. If we refuse to accept this paradise of the Pacific, then, in my judgment, we are morally precluded in the future from objecting to any other power accepting them and annexing them. We should annex them now or never. We should annex them now or be manly enough to declare to all the world that we have no interest in them and do not want them. We should not adopt the policy of the dog in the manger. I feel confident that if we refuse now to take them, that if we spurn their generous offer, some other nation will not be so blind to the many advantages of the situation; and if some other nation should annex them after our refusal, the complications that would be sure to arise sooner or later would no doubt lead to trouble.

We should take them now when there will be no trouble. We should take them now while everything is propitious. We should take them now because we need them in our military operations in the Pacific, and because we shall need them forever in the future for the protection of our coasts and our interests in the Pacific.

A few moments ago I called your attention to the testimony of Captain Mahan, our greatest naval authority. Let me now cite you a great military authority. I refer to Gen. John M. Schofield. He has recently said over his own signature that for years he has regarded the annexation of these islands for military and naval purposes a public necessity, and he says that not to annex the islands now, when we have the opportunity, would be a blunder worse than a crime.

All the military and naval authorities in this country are of the same opinion and have always been in accord on this subject. To my mind it seems apparent that we must accept these islands as a protection, from a naval and military standpoint, to our Pacific coast. We must hold and govern them for our own preservation. No halfway measure will suffice. This Government must take these islands or else some other great nation will do it.

Besides the great advantages of these rich and beautiful islands from a naval and military point of view, I favor their annexation to this country because I believe the time is at hand when the great and growing commercial interests of this country in the Orient demand it. [Applause.]

We are a great commercial country. Our commerce is growing, and must continue to grow, if we would be prosperous. I want to see this country the greatest commercial nation on earth. If we are wise, if we take advantage of opportunity, I doubt not we soon shall be. I will always do all in my power to foster, to build up, to develop, and to extend our commercial industries. To do otherwise would be shortsighted and unpatriotic. The commerce of a nation makes it rich and great. Asia and Africa and the East Indies are being opened up and developed to-day, and we must look to the Orient and get our share of its trade and commerce. We know to-day that we can not successfully compete with England, France, and Germany in the manufacture of many goods that are sold in Europe.

They have the markets there, and they hold the markets there. They are great manufacturing countries, and they can manufacture materials just as cheap if not cheaper than we can. They pay, as a general thing, less wages than we do, and their workmen and artisans labor more hours a day. We, too, are a great manufacturing country. We must find a market for our surplus goods. What we can not sell in Europe we must find a market for in Central and South America, in Asia and Africa, in the East Indies and the South Seas. Here is a new outlet and a great market. There is no doubt our merchants are aware of it and alive to its great advantages and rich opportunities. On account of time, distance, and the cheapness of transportation, the advantages are all with us for profitable trade and commerce in the Pacific.

Let me say to the business men of America, Look to the land of the setting sun, look to the Pacific! There are teeming millions there who will ere long want to be fed and clothed the same as we are. There is the great market that the continental powers are to-day struggling for. We must not be distanced in the race for the commerce of the world. In my judgment, during the next hundred years the great volume of trade and commerce, so far as this country is concerned, will not be eastward, but will be westward; will not be across the Atlantic, but will be across the broad Pacific. The Hawaiian Islands will be the key that will unlock to us the commerce of the Orient, and in a commercial sense make us rich and prosperous.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Does the gentleman say that this country can not compete with Europe in manufactures?

Mr. SULZER. I say in the manufacturing of many things from raw materials this country can not successfully compete with England, France, and Germany in the trade and commerce of Europe. There are many reasons for this, but I will only mention the difference in price of labor and transportation. These countries can manufacture and sell their goods cheaper in Europe than we can. The statistics, I think, will conclusively prove this; and hence I say we must get our share of the trade in the Orient.

If we do not, the balance of trade will each year be against us. If we increase our trade in the Pacific, business will increase here, new and more industries will spring up and grow, the idle labor of the land will find ready and remunerative employment, more men will be employed, more and higher wages will be paid, and the whole country will be more prosperous. In the great struggle now going on among the leading nations of the world for the markets and the commerce of the millions beyond the Pacific we must take the lead; we must not lag behind. [Applause.] The Hawaiian Islands are essential to our commercial supremacy in the Pacific. I believe every far-seeing business man in this country who will give a little time and study to this question will concur in this conclusion.

The Hawaiian Islands are not alone of great strategic advantage to us from a naval and military point of view in case of hostilities, but I believe they are of immense importance to us commercially, and will become more and more so every year. For us to refuse to annex them now would, in my judgment, be a grave political blunder, a mistake that might vex us sorely in the future; one that we may never be able to rectify without a terrible and devastating war.

It has been said on this floor several times that if we annex these islands it will mean an increase in the Navy. Against that bare assertion I place the testimony of the greatest naval and military authorities in the country. They all agree that the possession of these islands will not require an increase of the Navy. They all say that with the expenditure of a small amount of money comparatively these islands could be so fortified that the combined fleets of the world could not take them. That they would be a very bulwark of defense to us for the protection of our Pacific coast in time of war, and that as a safe place of refuge and of supplies for our merchant marine and our ships of war in times of danger their value and position can not be overestimated.

But, sir, even if the annexation of these islands required a larger Navy, I would still cast my vote for annexation. I believe in the Navy. Ever since I have been in Congress I have advocated and voted for all measures in the interest of the Navy. In my opinion, we want, and must have, a navy that will be large enough to protect our shores at home and our citizens and our interests in every foreign land. [Applause.] Who is there here to-day who will belittle our Navy? We are proud of it, proud of its past, and we have every reason to believe we will be proud of its future. We need a strong navy. We ought to have as good a navy as any nation in the world. We must build up our merchant marine. We must carry American goods in American ships and under the American flag. There was a day when the sails of our ships were seen on every ocean and our flag in every harbor of the world. That day will come again, and the policy we contemplate to-day will hasten it.

There is another reason why I favor the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands. The day, in my judgment, sir, is not far distant when this Government must build the Nicaragua Canal. That will shorten the distance to the Pacific possessions more than one-third. The trip of the Oregon has demonstrated that the canal across the Isthmus must be built as quickly as possible. It should have been built long ago. We must build it with our own money, we must own it ourselves, and we must hold it and manage it ourselves.

There is no work to-day more important for the Government to do. From all the information I can get I believe the canal can be built in less than two years, and that it will not cost $100,000,000. It would be one of the greatest things the Government ever did, and would pay for itself in less than twenty years. The Nicaragua Canal must be built, should be the watchword of the American people from now until it is completed and in successful operation. If we build the canal across the Isthmus, we must own the Hawaiian Islands. The latter is essential to the former.

When we accomplish these two things, I feel confident that a great step will have been taken to protect our coast, promote our commerce, and increase our prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, the question of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is not a new one. For more than half a century it has been considered and advocated by the leading statesmen and the ablest thinkers in our country. Years and years ago it was seen that sooner or later the islands would come to us and would be ours. All our history teaches this. A few years ago, when the monarchy died and the Republic of Hawaii reared its head among the nations of the world, all farseeing men knew it was only a question of a little while when she would come to us and ask us to make her a part of our domain. The time is at hand and we intend to grant her request. We know, and the people out there know, that a little state like Hawaii can not stand alone among her great competitors, all of whom covet her incomparable harbor, her rich and fertile lands, her salubrious climate, her commercial position and resources, and her invaluable natural strategic advantages. She must have the protection of this country or some other great power. So she comes to us in her helplessness and we gladly bid her welcome.

Another thing, sir, I desire to say at this time, and that is that this question is not a party question. It never was a party question, and it never ought to be made a party question. There should be no politics in it. It is a question of American statesmanship and American patriotism; nothing more, nothing less. If it can be made a party question at all, it is a Democratic one. The first man in this country to favor Hawaiian annexation, years and years ago, was that great Democrat from the State of New York, William L. Marcy, the greatest Secretary of State this country has ever had since the days of Thomas Jefferson. He saw the advantages of our acquiring these islands away back in the early days of the Republic. And since his day every Democratic Administration save one has done all it could to bring these islands under the sovereignty of this country.

Let me say to my Democratic colleagues on this side of the House that the policy of annexation has been good Democratic doctrine ever since this Government was founded. Every bit of territory, save Alaska, which has been annexed to this country since England recognized our independence has been annexed under and by virtue of a Democratic Administration. For years and years every leader in the Democratic party has been in favor of acquiring the Hawaiian Islands. The Democratic party, as a party, has never been opposed to it, and as I said before, I regret that to-day we are not a unit in favor of these resolutions. In my judgment, we ought to be. From the press and from the people all over this country, there comes to this House a cry to-day in favor of the annexation of those islands. Public opinion and public sentiment all over the country seem to be all one way.

Mr. GAINES. Why, then, when the Democrats had control of this House and the Senate, did they not pass this measure?

Mr. SULZER. Ask them; do not ask me. I was not a member then.

Mr. GAINES. You are making a declaration that Democrats have always favored the policy of annexation.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; in the past all but a few. One Democratic Executive was opposed to Hawaii. He hauled down the American flag on those islands. He tried to restore the monarchy and came very near succeeding. I am glad he failed. I believed then, and I believe now, that his action in this case was the most unwise, the most impolitic, and the most unpatriotic thing he did during his Administration. I know many Democrats stood by him in Congress then, and some of them who are here to-day no doubt take the stand they do because they dislike to stultify their records. I said then, and I say now, that it was a mistake, a sad political mistake, when a Democratic Executive ordered the Stars and Stripes that floated over Hawaii hauled down, and sought in every way to overturn the provisional government and restore the disgraced and degenerate monarchy. [Applause.]

The American people are not in sympathy with any man who hauls down the American flag in favor of monarchy. [Applause.] When the Hawaiian Monarchy collapsed it fell like a rotten tree on the bank of a turbulent stream, quickly to be swept away and never to be restored. It is not democratic policy to restore a dead monarchy in the place of a live republic on this hemisphere. Our sympathies are all with the people, with free institutions; they are all against monarchies, and with governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. The day is not far distant when a monarchical flag will not wave over an inch of territory on the Western Hemisphere or on the islands adjacent thereto. Jefferson's dream is coming true when this Western World, from Baffin's Bay to the Straits of Magellan, will be dedicated to freedom and to free institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the assertion has been made that the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is a departure from the Monroe doctrine. I want to controvert that statement. I am as firm a believer in the Monroe doctrine as anyone. If I thought for one moment that the annexation of these islands was a violation of the Monroe doctrine I would abandon annexation and stand by the Monroe doctrine. I say the Monroe doctrine has nothing whatever to do with this question. The Monroe doctrine precludes foreign powers from acquiring additional territory on this hemisphere, but it surely does not prevent us from annexing contiguous territory essential to our own preservation. To contend otherwise would be ridiculous.

The history of this country is a record of national progress, national development, and national expansion. From a child we have grown in a little over a century to a giant among the powers of the earth.

The whole history of this country teaches, if it teaches anything, that it is unwise politically to get in the way of national progress.

Every foot of territory heretofore acquired has been gained in the teeth of violent opposition. Yet who would part with any of it to-day? The annexation of Alaska, the annexation of the Californias, the annexation of Texas, the annexation of the Floridas, and the annexation of Louisiana and the great northwest territory by Jefferson, the greatest thing ever done in this country since the Revolution, were all bitterly fought and opposed. Every purchase, every acquisition, has been more than justified. And so, in my judgment, will be this acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands.

Sir, we are making history very fast during these closing years of the nineteenth century—faster than most people imagine. This is an era of rapid progress and development. Why should we not accept the Hawaiian Islands? There are a thousand reasons why we should. I know of not one good valid reason why we should not. It is said the sugar trust is opposed to annexation; but that opposition should not deter us from doing our duty. It is said that some of the great powers do not think kindly of annexation. I answer, if that be true, that is the best reason why we should at once acquire these islands, and that now not a nation on earth can or will dare object. And I proclaim that if we now turn our backs on Hawaii and refuse to accept her generous and magnificent gift, we will be, and we ought to be, the laughingstock of the civilized world.

Standing here to-day, I voice my own views and my own sentiments. I speak only for my own constituency. But yet, sir, I do not hesitate to say that I regret exceedingly that these resolutions can not pass this House with the same unanimous voice and vote as the resolutions to make Cuba free. On the 1st day of April, 1893, the American flag was hauled down at Honolulu. Five years afterwards, under the same American flag, the booming guns of Dewey's battle ships sounded a new note on the Pacific shores, a note that has been echoed and reechoed around the world, and that note is that we are on the Pacific, that we are there to stay, and that we are there to protect our rights, promote our interests, and get our share of the trade and commerce of the opulent Orient. [Prolonged applause.]

Yes, sir; in my judgment, if we but use ordinary care and watchfulness we are destined to become, in spite of ourselves, the richest and the greatest commercial nation the world has ever seen. Look at our past. What may be expected of the future? Already most of Europe is jealous and envious of us, and our ancient foe, England, now begs an alliance. But we need no alliance with England or any other country. All we need is a firm reliance on ourselves. Our mission on earth is a mission of peace. We seek no quarrel; neither do we fear one, as haughty Spain has learned to her sorrow. [Applause.]

We are now commercially great, but we must grow and expand and become greater. We should strive to extend our trade and commerce. We have the men, the climate, the brain, the brawn, and the genius. For one I stand for national progress, national development, and national growth. I do not believe nations, any more than individuals, can stand still very long without retrograding. The past is secure. We must legislate for the present and the future. I have no sympathy with the Bourbonism that never forgets and never learns. We must keep abreast of the times and be up to date. We must meet each new question as it arises, and with a singleness of purpose for the public good decide it for the best interests of all the people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to have a little more time.

Mr. HITT. I can yield to the gentleman only ten minutes more. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Now, sir, I contend that no gentleman here who has studied the situation in Europe, that no gentleman here who has watched the march of the European nations into Africa and Asia, can possibly misunderstand the drift of the times.

The great powers of Europe are seeking new markets for their manufactured goods. They know that the markets of the world control the commercial destiny of nations. We must watch our rights and protect our interests in the Pacific. If we do not, I believe we will do the commercial interests in this country an irreparable injury. Our first step should be to annex Hawaii. That is the key to the whole situation. Our next step should be to build the Nicaragua Canal, and our third step should be to rebuild and reestablish our merchant marine. Annex Hawaii, and all the others will follow like the day the night.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman from New York again permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Were you in the Chicago convention?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I was a delegate.

Mr. GAINES. Did you offer any pro-Hawaiian resolution there?

Mr. SULZER. No; I offered a resolution there for free Cuba, and I am glad to say it was adopted.

Mr. GAINES. Why did you not offer the other?

Mr. SULZER. Well, sir, one thing at a time has always been my motto.

Mr. GAINES. Then let us get through with Cuba, and then we will consider this other matter.

Mr. SULZER. One thing at a time. Sufficient unto the day is the duty thereof. Cuba is now free to all intents and purposes, and we have this matter before us. I am on record in this House and out of it in favor of Cuban independence and Hawaiian annexation. On several occasions in this House I have spoken briefly in favor of Hawaiian annexation. I was for the Cubans first. When they got their independence, I was for the Hawaiians. I want to see the Hawaiians also free and happy, and I do not think they can be unless, as they say themselves, we take them under the protecting folds of the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. Did you bring in a minority report in favor of Hawaii or say anything about it in the Chicago convention?

Mr. SULZER. The Democratic national platform is silent about Hawaii. How it was left out I know not. I was not a member of the committee on resolutions and platform. Perhaps it was omitted out of personal regard for certain distinguished Democrats; perhaps not. I can not tell. I do not know. I respectfully refer the gentleman to my speeches in this House and to the record of the proceedings of the last Democratic national convention. I say now that the time has come when we are going to place "Old Glory" once more over the ramparts of the Government buildings in Honolulu, never again to be hauled down. [Applause.]

Now, sir, Hawaii is the key to the whole Pacific, and the commercial value of Hawaii, and its consequent importance to the United States, can be very clearly seen from the following study of distances from Honolulu:

	Miles.		Miles.
Unalaska.....	2,016	New Zealand.....	3,900
San Francisco.....	2,009	New Guinea.....	4,000
Marshall Islands.....	2,008	Nicaragua Canal.....	4,210
Portland, Oreg.....	2,200	Sydney, Australia.....	4,800
Samoa.....	2,220	Panama.....	4,885
San Diego, Cal.....	2,250	Manila.....	4,700
Victoria, British Columbia.....	2,300	Borneo.....	4,850
Tahiti.....	2,380	Hongkong.....	4,917
Sitka.....	2,395	Vladivostok.....	5,006
Caroline Islands.....	2,602	Callao.....	5,147
Fiji.....	2,730	Singapore.....	5,760
Yokohama.....	3,380	Valparaiso.....	5,916
New Caledonia.....	3,500	Cape Horn.....	6,900
Kamchatka.....	3,800

No one can study these figures carefully and be in doubt as to his duty as a patriotic American citizen, having the best interests of the whole country at heart. And with the Nicaragua Canal built and owned by us the proposition in favor of annexation is emphasized beyond successful controversy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in conclusion, because I observe that my time is nearly exhausted, that events are potent and incontrovertible arguments; and recent events, which no man can mistake or misunderstand, demonstrate beyond dispute the absolute necessity of our annexing the Hawaiian Islands now and at once in order to more successfully prosecute our war with Spain. Those in authority say the annexation of these islands is an immediate military necessity. For that reason and for the reasons I have already expressed, I shall cast my vote for annexation. I feel confident of my position, and sincerely believe the future and subsequent events will justify the stand I now take.

I shall cast my vote in favor of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, because we need them as a naval and military necessity now and in the future for the purpose of protecting and defending the territory and the commerce which we already own. We need the Hawaiian Islands for national defense. They are the key to the Pacific, and the only coaling station in the Pacific Ocean between the Arctic Ocean and the Equator, between the continent of Asia and the coast of North America. Not to annex them now would be national folly; to annex them, security, peace, and national insurance. [Long applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not share the apprehension of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that the policy of annexation of Hawaii involves a policy which may include within the ultimate membership of this House a member from Patagonia or a gentleman from the Cannibal Islands.

The Constitution of the United States has been interpreted many times in favor of the general power of annexation, notably in the cases of Louisiana, California, Alaska, and Florida, and under the act of 1856 this Government has extended its dominion over many islands remote from our shores, one of them, Midway Island, being 1,000 miles to the westward of Hawaii.

This is no new question. It has been a part of American diplomacy for many years to preserve these islands from control of any other nation.

As it has been a part of our diplomatic declarations in the past that we could not with indifference see Cuba passing from Spain to any other European power, so it has been the consistent policy of this Government for more than fifty years, beginning with the Administration of President Tyler, in 1842, that we could not with indifference see Hawaii passing into the control of any other power.

During all this time the declared policy of this Government for successive Administrations has been against control by any other power, and at the same time we have fostered relations with Hawaii tending to ultimate annexation.

Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State in 1881, declared that "the situation of the Hawaiian Islands, giving them strategic control of the North Pacific, brings their possession within the range of questions of a purely American policy." A Democratic President, Pierce, and a Democratic Secretary of State, Marcy, caused a treaty of annexation to be negotiated in 1854, and President Johnson, in 1867, by special message to Congress, urged a reciprocity treaty with Hawaii as a step toward the time when the people of Hawaii should of their own volition apply for admission to the Union.

Under Harrison an annexation treaty was negotiated and failed of confirmation.

In 1897 Mr. McKinley caused an annexation treaty to be negotiated with Hawaii, and in his message accompanying the treaty on its transmission to Congress, after reviewing the history of our Hawaiian relations, concludes with the declaration that annexation is not a change, but a consummation.

This question has resolved itself practically into this, whether this Government is willing to receive a conveyance in fee simple of the Hawaiian Islands without money, price, or conquest.

I predicate no argument upon territorial acquisition. These islands are small. Their extent of territory is inconsiderable. We have much unimproved territory, many overgrown fence corners to clean out and much water power running to waste.

In my opinion the most powerful argument in favor of annexation is that we thereby preempt the only anchorage ground, the only coaling station and base of supplies from which a hostile fleet could make descent upon our western coast and to which it could retire.

England, France, Germany, Japan, and Russia all have powerful squadrons in the Pacific, and each of these squadrons is stronger than our own.

If Hawaii once passes into the possession of a first-class power, it will not lightly change possession again.

Gibraltar is the grim example of how much easier it is for a stronghold to get into the possession of a strong nation and how hard it is to get it out again.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs reports that it is estimated that Pearl Harbor could be fortified at a cost of $500,000 to resist the attacks of fleets far stronger than our own.

Holding this all-important strategic point—the enemy could not remain in that part of the Pacific, thousands of miles from any base, without running out of coal, sufficient to get back to their own possessions.

The report continues—

The weight of testimony is that the possession of these islands would make secure both our fleet and our western coast.

Naval experts agree that it would cost far less to protect the Pacific coast with the Hawaiian Islands than without them.

In this connection permit me to quote from the testimony of General Schofield before the Foreign Affairs Committee:

The most important feature of all is that it economizes the naval force rather than increases it. It is capable of absolute defense by shore batteries; so that a naval fleet, after going there and replenishing its supplies and making what repairs are needed, can go away and leave the harbor perfectly safe under the protection of the Army. Then arises at once the question why this harbor will be of consequence to the United States. It has not been easy to make that perfectly clear to the minds of men who have not made such subjects the study of a lifetime till now; but the conditions of the present war, it seems to me, ought to make it clear to everybody.

At this moment the Government is fitting out quite a large fleet of steamers at San Francisco to carry large detachments of troops and military supplies of all kinds to the Philippine Islands. Honolulu is almost in the direct route. That fleet, of course, will want very much to recoal at Honolulu, thus saving that amount of freight and tonnage for essential stores to be carried with it. Otherwise they would have to carry coal enough to carry them all the way from San Francisco to Manila, and that would occupy a large amount of the carrying capacity of the fleet, and if they recoal at Honolulu all that will be saved. More than that, a fleet is liable at any time to meet with stress of weather, or perhaps a heavy storm, and there might be an accident to the machinery which will make it necessary to put into the nearest port possible for repairs and additional supplies. By the time it reaches there its coal supply may be well-nigh exhausted. It then has to replenish its coal supply to carry it to whatever port it could reach.

If I am not misinformed in regard to the laws of neutrality, the supply of coal that can be taken on board at neutral ports is only sufficient to bring it back to the nearest home port, and not enough to carry it across the ocean, so that if we had to regard Honolulu as a neutral port we could only load up coal enough to bring us back to San Francisco; and if I am misinformed in regard to that point Admiral Walker will correct me. Now, let us suppose, on the other hand, that the Spanish navy in the Pacific as well as in the Atlantic, or both, were a little stronger than ours instead of being somewhat weaker. The first thing they would do would be to go and take possession of the Sandwich Islands and make them the base of naval operations against the Pacific coast.

You have only to consider the state of mind which exists all along the Atlantic coast under the erroneous apprehension that the Spanish fleet might possibly assail our coast to see what would be the case if the Spanish fleet were a good deal stronger than ours and took possession of Honolulu and made it a base of operations in attacking the points on the Pacific coast. We would be absolutely powerless, because we would have no fleet there to dispute the possession of the Sandwich Islands, whereas, if we held that place and fortified it so that a foreign navy could not take it, it could not operate against the Pacific coast at all, for it could not bring coal enough across the Pacific Ocean to sustain an attack on the Pacific coast. Then the Sandwich Islands would be a base for naval operations just as Puerto Rico is against the Atlantic coast. If Spain is strong enough to hold Puerto Rico, so that a squadron can replenish with supplies, coal, ammunition, and provisions there, the whole Spanish fleet can raid our Atlantic coast at will.

The Spanish fleet on the Asiatic station was the only one of all the fleets we could have overcome as we did. Of course, that can not again happen, for we will not be able to pick up so weak an enemy next time. We are liable at any time to get into a war with a nation which has a more powerful fleet than ours, and it is of vital importance, therefore, if we can, to hold the point from which they can conduct operations against our Pacific coast. Especially is that true until the Nicaragua Canal is finished, because we can not send a fleet from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We can not send them around Cape Horn and repel an attack there. If we had the canal finished, we would be very much better off than now in that respect, but even then we would want the possession of that base very much, without which no power on earth except England can carry on a war against us.

It is admitted that a protectorate can not accomplish these results, because a protectorate imposes responsibility without control.

Besides, a protectorate is unknown to and has no part in our American system.

It is a device of Great Britain intended for temporary lien on territory which she is not ready to annex outright.

Annexation means responsibility with control.

A protectorate means responsibility without control, with all the disagreeable possibilities growing out of such relation.

By annexation we post these islands like sentinels in the midst of the Pacific.

By reason of the vast waste of water that surrounds them and because of the limited coaling and steaming capacity of even the most powerful vessels, these islands command the North Pacific as Gibraltar commands the Mediterranean, as Constantinople commands the Black Sea. As Captain Mahan says, "As a strategical post Hawaii stands alone, having no rival and admitting no rival."

Hawaii lies 2,100 miles out from San Francisco.

From Honolulu to Yokohama is 3,400 miles and from Honolulu to Hongkong is 4,900 miles.

From Unalaska, the nearest port on the north, to Tahiti, the nearest port to the south, is 4,400 miles.

Nowhere in the Pacific north of the equatorial line is there another port from which a hostile fleet could operate against our western coast.

The lines of ocean travel intersect there.

It is the crossroads of the sea.

In spite of the icy and stormy allurements of the theoretic route discovered by the gentleman from Arkansas by way of Kyska, of the seven trans-Pacific steamship lines plying between North American ports and Japan, China, and Australia all but one make the port of Honolulu a way station, and not one touches at the Aleutian Islands.

Macaulay somewhere observes that the true surgeon is made at the bedside and the true mariner upon the rolling waves.

The gentleman from the maritime State of Arkansas, however, in his own proper person, illustrates the fallacy of this proposition. [Laughter.]

Frobisher, Drake, Gilbert, and Magellan explored the trackless waste in the teeth of storms or slept becalmed in unknown seas and limned new lands upon the map of the world by actual exploration.

But the gentleman from the State of Arkansas, in the seclusion of the committee room of Foreign Affairs, by diligent study of globes, maps, and atlases, has found a new port far out beyond the scimitar point of Alaska, a port in the midst of arctic snows and storms and frost and fog, lying where the ceaseless current sweeps up the Asiatic coast and swerves southward along the North American shore, on an island to be dedicated to the uses of a shorter route to Asia.

This island should be renamed in honor of its discoverer, that no wrong shall be done to geographical enterprise. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen say Hawaii is remote from our western coast, and it is so; but modern means of travel and communication have almost annihilated time and space.

It took Washington weeks to travel from Mount Vernon to Boston. Now the traveler can go from Washington to Boston in 16 hours without changing cars.

Napoleon estimated distance by days' marches. A day's march was 25 miles. Six days from Paris, then, was 150 miles.

Now, six days' voyage from San Francisco to Honolulu is 2,100 miles. Therefore, Hawaii is no farther out from San Francisco now than a point 150 miles out, was distant from Paris in the days of Napoleon.

This is the miracle of steam and a sample of the possibilities hidden under the lid of Watt's teakettle.

COMMERCE

The Hawaiian Islands lie in the track of commerce, and commerce seeks always the best market. Trade seeks the people who do not produce, but who want what we produce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am very thankful to the gentleman. I want to print as a part of my remarks something which is of great interest to Southern gentlemen, namely, a presentation by Mr. Barrett, our minister to Siam, of a theme important not only to the South but to commercial circles generally.

Minister Barrett says:

SOUTH'S PRODUCTS—OPPORTUNITY FOR BUILDING UP TRADE IN FAR EAST—ASIA'S MILLIONS IN NEED OF COTTON—ARGUMENT FOR NICARAGUAN CANAL AND HAWAIIAN ANNEXATION—IMPORTANT STATISTICS.

"Does the South appreciate her opportunity in the far East? Does she realize that the mighty markets of Asia's millions await her best efforts at exploitation? If not, she should. The far East is not reserved for our Pacific coast alone, not for the manufacturing cities of our Atlantic seaboard only, not for the exclusive control of Europe; no, not by any means, but for the South of the United States as well, provided the opportunity is seized before it is too late.

"Some parts of the South and some Southerners, more enterprising than their competitors, are already at work, and, if they are reading what I write, can doubtless foretell my proposition. The average Southerner, however, will be skeptical in accepting my suggestion that his particular portion of the United States has any particular interest in the far East.

"To get to my point: King Cotton can tell the story!

"The far East wants the South's cotton; it wants a lot of it! It wants it now, and it wants a lot of it! It wants it now and in years it will want twenty times what it demands now.

"ASIA'S MILLIONS WANT COTTON."

"First. There are nearly 500,000,000 inhabitants of these lands—far surpassing the United States in area—whose shores are washed by the Pacific and are directly across the seas from our western coast.

"Second. The demands of these millions, though small individually, are vast in the aggregate, and are increasing with great rapidity—even more rapidly than the chief experts in commerce and trade have dared prophesy in their wildest moments of hypothetical reasoning—and still China is hardly awake yet. When she does move, look out for her. It will be like an avalanche.

"Third. Of this half billion population, 350,000,000 wear almost nothing but cotton clothing and use nothing but cotton materials for the hundred and one other uses that cloth is put to. * * * It is noticeable that the demand for cotton goods of all kinds has increased during the last few years far more rapidly than the population, and that sales are on an ascending scale, which means a brilliant future for the trade in cotton goods and raw cotton.

"CONDITION OF COTTON SUPPLY."

"Fourth. The supply of raw cotton in China is so small, compared to the total consumption of cotton goods, that it could never meet the demand if supplies from other lands, like India, Egypt, and America, were cut off. It is true that China even exports cotton, but that goes only to Japan and simply for manufacture, to be shipped back as cotton yarn or piece goods. Then, again, cotton-growing is not a science in China, while the soil and sun do not seem to suit it like our own favored Dixie's warmth and fertility. The product of 1 acre of good cotton land in the United States will equal that of 5 to 10 in China. The time may come when China's millions will learn how to grow all their cotton in China's numberless acres, but that day is so far distant as not to discourage the planters and manufacturers of the South in exploiting these Asiatic markets. And mind, please, I have only spoken of China. Japan can never supply her own mills with the raw product, now over one hundred in number and being added to every year. Eastern Siberia, Corea, Formosa, Cochinchina, Siam, Straits Settlements, Java, Borneo, and the Philippines are great purchasers of cotton goods, and even if mills should be started in their cities the raw product must still be imported.

"WILL THE SOUTH MEET THE DEMAND?"

"Fifth. The tendency now of the far East, illustrated by the development of cotton manufacturing in Japan with headquarters at Osaka, and by the working and construction of numerous mills at Shanghai and other points in China, is to supply the market on the spot with the finished product instead of depending entirely on Europe and America. So the demand for raw cotton in Japan and China has suddenly jumped ahead into considerable proportion; and now comes the question: Can and will the South meet this demand and so provide herself with a vast new market, eventually free her from absolute reliance on those of Europe and home, and making her great staple an increased source of wealth to every cotton-producing State, and hence collectively to the entire South?

"INDIA, CHINA, AND EGYPT."

"Sixth. The field is not one to be controlled without competition. Far from it. The cotton merchants of India, China, and Egypt are making a vigorous effort to supply the far Eastern demand. Egypt counts on her near route by the Suez Canal and her cheap labor to eventually rule the market, while India and China contend that they have even a greater advantage in both these respects; but there are certain conditions favorable to American cotton which, if followed up properly, will more than counterbalance the nearness and cheapness of Indian, Chinese, and Egyptian supplies. One is the quality of American cotton. Both the Japanese and Chinese manufacturers distinctly prefer it. It is manufactured more easily and seems to make more and better cloth. Then, when placed on the market, the buyers prefer both the yarn and cloth made from it.

"FREIGHT RATES CHIEF EMBARGO."

"Seventh. The only serious difficulty in the way of American cotton is the price, which is made high solely by the freight rates from the South to Japan and China. I have visited every cotton manufactory of any importance in these two countries, and wherever I found them using Indian, Chinese, or Egyptian cotton the managers frankly told me that they would buy American cotton exclusively if the combined rail and steamer charges were not often prohibitive. The American cotton now shipped to the far East is consumed by mills which have a special market, but they represent a small proportion of the total. In short, were freight rates favorable and did the Southern exporters push the market American cotton would monopolize the supply for the mills of trans-Pacific lands. What, then, remains to be done?

"NICARAGUA CANAL THE KEY."

"Eighth. The supreme advantage to be gained, which will, with 'one fell stroke,' accomplish the end desired, is the early construction and operation of the Nicaragua Canal. Unless that waterway is dug I can not see how the South can ever win permanently even a fair share of this mighty Pacific trade, and that is the opinion of nearly all experts in the far East whom I have consulted. A trans-isthmian canal is the key to the trans-Pacific. The long rail haul from the South to the Pacific seaboard will always keep the delivered cost of American cotton just beyond the point of general and successful competition. Dig the canal, and a large fleet of steamers will carry cotton in bulk from all Southern ports to the far East for the same rate that is now charged from San Francisco to Kobe and Shanghai. As this statement is read I can imagine a skeptical look on many faces and an insinuation that I am indulging in exaggeration.

"Ninth. Let us see. In the first place, the rates charged by steamers crossing the Pacific are equal to or greater than those charged by steamers from the Mediterranean going a greater distance, and not much less than the through rates from London, Liverpool, Hamburg, Bremen, and Amsterdam, thus showing that there is yet a large margin on the Pacific route that can be taken off if necessary.

"MOST IMPORTANT STATEMENTS."

"In the second place, I desire to lay before the planters and exporters of the South two most important statements made to me, respectively, by leading stockholders of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, Japan's great navigation company, and the Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company, England's chief foreign line, which two companies combined control more steamers than any other three, barring one German and one French system, in the world.

"The representative of the former said to me that the moment the Nicaragua Canal was opened his company would put on a fleet of at least ten large steamers to run from Japan and China to the leading ports of the South, the principal object of which would be to carry cotton. In order to have outward cargoes they might touch en route at San Francisco, and then possibly on the Atlantic side go on to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, but their chief destination would be the Southern ports like Galveston, New Orleans, Mobile, Tampa, Charleston, Savannah, and Norfolk. He said this plan had been carefully considered by the company, and, in expressing surprise that the United States had not already dug the canal, added with pride, 'If Japan controlled the opportunity or concession, the canal would have been completed and opened to the world's traffic before this.'

"The representative of the Peninsular and Oriental informed me almost in a confidential way that his company had long considered the revolution of the trade of the world that would be accomplished by the construction of the isthmian canal, and intended to put on a special line of large carriers to run practically around the world via the Southern ports of the United States and through the canal to Asia, in order to carry the cotton of the South to Japan and China. From the latter they would take cargoes via Suez to Europe, from Europe to America, and so on. Certainly both of these are practical schemes, while they show the importance of the South's opportunity in the Pacific. Both authorities told me that their steamers would carry cotton from Southern ports to Japan and China at competitive rates with other sources of supply, and less than those now charged from San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle to Yokohama, Kobe, and Shanghai.

"HAWAIIAN ANNEXATION AND PACIFIC CABLE."

"Without weakening the force of my main proposition by introducing ulterior issues, but desiring to make my treatment of the question comprehensive, I would urge the South to use its powerful influence in favor of two other projects whose consummation is necessary if the United States would control the commerce and trade of the Pacific or become the great material and moral power in its waters—the annexation of Hawaii and the construction of a Pacific cable.

"We need Hawaii to properly protect our cotton, flour, and richly laden ships which, with the opening of the canal and the inevitable growth of our merchant marine, will one day ply on the Pacific like the Spanish galleons of old; to provide them with a coaling station in mid-ocean under our flag; to prevent other nations from seizing and utilizing it as a point from which to dispatch commerce-destroying squadrons, and, in short, to make ourselves actual and not the theoretical masters of the Pacific seas. We require a Pacific cable under American control to telegraph cotton and other orders and fill or change them at the shortest notice and without the cost, surveillance, uncertainty, and roundabout way of the present system through Asia and Europe, on which we are now absolutely dependent.

"A FINAL APPEAL."

"In conclusion, therefore, I would appeal to the South to look carefully to the far East, to prepare to supply its demands and vigorously meet competition; to send capable and untiring agents to deal directly with Asiatic buyers; to sell at the lowest prices possible for the successful introduction of cotton; to place samples on exhibition in the principal markets; to urge the construction of a Pacific cable and the annexation of Hawaii; to try in the meantime to make railway and steamship companies quote the lowest rates possible in order that she may keep what little hold she already has, and, finally, and above all other considerations, bend her energies for the immediate construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

"The far East, with uncounted millions to clothe and feed, and with wealth to pay for such clothes and food, invites the United States to supply her wants. The Pacific coast is awakening to the knowledge that she can supply the food in the form of flour. Will the South realize that she can supply the clothes in the form of cotton?

"The South's great opportunity to win new markets for her chief staple lies in the trans-Pacific lands. Will she seize the opportunity?"

Mr. Barrett reminds the people of the South that the touch of advancing civilization will galvanize into life an active demand for the cotton product of the South along the western coast of the Pacific, and that the opening of the Nicaragua Canal will bring the South and East about 10,000 miles nearer the lines of North American trans-Pacific trade.

The recent cruise of the Oregon, creeping down the western coasts of two continents and up the other side, is an object lesson of the importance of a short cut to the Pacific.

SUGAR.

The gentleman from Georgia states in effect that annexation would operate in the interests of the sugar trust.

The sugar trust is engaged in the business of refining sugar, not in its production.

It operates upon the raw product as the Standard Oil Company operates upon oil and the coffee trust upon coffee.

Under our reciprocity treaty with Hawaii, only raw sugar is admitted duty free.

The trust buys the raw product of Hawaii at a somewhat less figure than it buys raw sugar elsewhere, because the longer carriage to other markets and the comparative nearness of the American market compel Hawaiian sugar producers to take this lower price.

The trust does not own an acre of sugar-producing lands in Hawaii.

It converts the raw sugar into the granulated or refined sugar, making its money in the process of refining and in the magnitude of its operations.

With annexation all grades of sugar, refined and unrefined, could come in free.

The Hawaiian producers would speedily erect their own refineries and compete with the trust in our markets for the sale of their own refined product.

I would be glad indeed, sir, if we could annex conditions to annexation to prevent any trust or combination ever gaining control of Hawaiian sugar.

As to this country, I look forward to a time when the beet-sugar industry will make sugar beats the common product of our farmers, giving them another staple product besides wheat.

The policy of encouraging and fostering the beet-growing industry in this country under wise Republican legislation is the most splendid policy conceivable at present for the practical benefit of American agriculture.

I call attention to the following statistics on this subject:

United States sugar consumption statistics.

	Tons.
World's production of sugar, crop of 1896-97.....	7,837,000
Sugar consumption of the United States for 1896.....	2,263,000
Sugar imported from Hawaii, 1896.....	176,000
Sugar imported from countries other than Hawaii in 1896.....	1,774,500
Cane sugar produced in United States in 1896.....	200,000
Beet sugar produced in United States in 1896.....	44,500

United States Treasury statistics for the last twenty-three years show that the average annual increase of sugar consumption in the United States has been 12 per cent.

If the increase for 1896 is up to the average, it will amount to nearly 300,000 tons, making a total consumption of approximately 2,560,000 tons for the year.

If the increased consumption should amount to only one-third the previous average, say 100,000 tons per annum, the United States consumption in ten years would amount to 3,200,000 tons per annum.

WHAT WILL BE REQUIRED TO SUPPLY THE UNITED STATES WITH DOMESTIC BEET SUGAR.

Average size of beet-sugar factory, capacity for producing 2,500 tons of sugar per crop.

Average cost of such factory.....	$350,000
Amount of sugar imported from countries other than Hawaii during 1896..... tons..	1,774,500
To produce this quantity would require 500 factories, costing.....	$177,000,000
If the annual increase in consumption of sugar in the United States is only 6 per cent instead of 12 per cent, as it has been for the last twenty-three years, there will be required each year 42 additional factories, costing each year.....	$14,700,000
Thus in the next ten years it will require at least 420 additional factories to supply the annual increase in consumption alone, costing.....	$147,000,000

Until the present amount imported and all the increased consumption is supplied by beet sugar, there will be no "competition" by Hawaii in sugar.

With every farm growing its crop of beets for this mighty home consumption the sugar trust will no longer be a factor for consideration.

It has been suggested that by annexation we annex a sugar-producing area that will injuriously compete with our own home producers.

This is a view industriously fostered, I am told, by the sugar trust at some expense.

But to say that the small Hawaiian product could appreciably affect the general sugar market here would be like saying that a carload of wheat shipped into the Northwest could modify the general price of wheat.

The controlling intelligent forces of Hawaii are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh.

In the annexation of Hawaii we merge no alien nationality.

We annex American institutions, American holidays, American courts, and American laws.

Americans now own approximately three-fourths of all the property in Hawaii.

Americans consume 98 per cent of their exports.

Americans furnish 75 per cent of their imports.

And 75 per cent of their foreign trade is carried in vessels flying the American flag.

The people are American in sympathy, and lately Hawaii harbored and is still harboring our vessels on their way to Manila in defiance of the law of nations, which forbids a neutral power to harbor, aid, or support a belligerent in time of war.

These islands have been repeatedly seized by other powers, but have hitherto escaped conquest.

But without invasion, without conquest, and without force the old Stars and Stripes went up there four years ago spontaneously, as emblematic of a government already American from choice.

Someone hauled them down then, it is true, but willing hands are still waiting to haul them up again and nail them there, to flap for all time in the winds of the Pacific. [Applause.]

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order of yesterday be so modified as to permit the session of this afternoon to extend until fifteen minutes past 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the order of yesterday be so modified as to extend the time for taking the recess until fifteen minutes past 5. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time up to the recess to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

[Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LACEY). The hour of 5 o'clock and 15 minutes having arrived, the House stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, the evening session from 8 to 10.30 o'clock to be for debate only upon the pending resolution.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., resumed its session, with Mr. LACEY in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARHAM] is recognized.

Mr. BARHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to enter at length upon the discussion of the resolutions now under consideration; nor do I hope or expect to advance any new ideas upon the argument of a question which has so thoroughly met consideration through the public press by the Secretaries of Agriculture, War, and Navy, and in reports by committees to Congress.

I have long favored the annexation of Hawaii from a commercial and military point of view. These islands, in my opinion, should become a part of the territory of the United States.

The first proposition which I desire to call to the attention of the House is the first point which was made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], and that is as to the constitutionality of the resolutions. It seems singular to me, Mr. Speaker, that at this day and age it should be necessary to discuss questions of this kind, for the action proposed in the resolutions has long been settled to be constitutional, not only by legislative construction, but by judicial construction and by the voice of the people, pronounced in every possible way.

There are a number of provisions of the Constitution under which the power to pass these resolutions may be found. First, there is the power to promote the general welfare and the common defense of the country. It has been repeatedly declared upon the floor of this House by members that in their opinion these islands are necessary for the common defense of this country. If there was no other provision in the Constitution, that of itself would warrant this character of procedure.

Now, take the general-welfare clause. Under that these resolutions may be passed by Congress and be within the provisions of our Constitution. Those of us who believe that it is for the best interest and general welfare of the country to annex the islands, believe so from commercial, military, and other reasons. So far as I am concerned, I believe these islands are of great military and commercial importance, therefore coming under two rules, the general welfare and common defense of the country. But, Mr. Speaker, there is another provision of the Constitution under which these resolutions are also constitutional and within the power of Congress to adopt—under that provision which declares that Congress shall have power to admit a State. Now, it is an elementary principle of law as old as civilization itself, it is concurrent with the birth of jurisprudence itself, that the "greater contains the less." It is conceded on all sides that the Congress of the United States has the power to admit a State. Now, taking the elementary principle conceded by everybody, that the "greater contains the less." Congress has of necessity the right and power to annex a Territory. And that is not without judicial construction.

Now, what is a State? A State, in a strict construction of the word, means a political body, an independent sovereignty. Under that definition there is no such a thing as a State in the American Union, nor is there such a thing under that definition either as to the General Government, the National Government, because the States have only the power which has been reserved to them, and such incidental power as is necessary to carry out the reserved power. The General Government only has the power which has been granted by the States, with the incidental power necessary to carry out the granted power.

Now, early in the history of the country the question arose in a suit by the District of Columbia as to whether it had the power to sue, to bring action. Unless it was a State it could not bring an action. The Supreme Court of the United States held that in the broader and primary sense of the word "State" that the District of Columbia is a State. Well, anybody knows that it is not a State in the ordinary acceptance of the terms as used in America. It never had any representation by Senators. It did at one time have representation upon the floor of this House.

Again this question arose under the revenue laws of this country, where the revenue laws provided for the manner of collecting the revenues—the internal revenues—among the States. The Supreme Court of the United States found no difficulty in holding that a Territory is a State within the meaning of that act. And, again, in the Dred Scott case it necessarily followed from the decision which was rendered in that case that a Territory was a State. Dred Scott, his wife, and two babies were slaves. They were taken from the State of Missouri into Illinois, and from Illinois to Fort Snelling, which was west of the Mississippi River. That was then a part of the territory of the United States. The point, of necessity, arose as to whether the Territory was a State.

Now, I want to read, right in connection with this, just exactly what the Supreme Court said in the Dred Scott case, commencing where the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] left off by the remark that the opinion following what he had read was obiter dictum. I think, however, that the gentleman from Arkansas is the last man in America who should raise any question about what was settled in the Dred Scott case.

Before I read that, however, I want to call attention of the House to a point that was submitted. He based his argument on the declaration of Mr. Madison as to the unconstitutionality of the admission of the territory known as the Northwest Territory, that which was granted to the Confederation by Virginia before the Constitution was adopted and during the Federation. Mr. Madison thought that that was beyond the power of the Confederate States, and probably it was. The Confederate States really had no Congress. They were only kind of ministers or ambassadors to Congress with limited power. But this great Northwestern Territory was admitted by the Congress of the Confederate States.

Now, if Mr. Madison meant that the Congress of the United States which was to come after the adoption of the Constitution should have no such power, he certainly misconstrued the provision of the Constitution. For the fact is that immediately following the adoption of the Constitution on the 2d of April, 1790, the Congress of the United States accepted just such a cession from the State of North Carolina. The State of North Carolina held a certain territory, and deeded it to the United States, and by an act of Congress, which you will find in the first statutes of the Congress of the United States, the Congress of the United States—not the treaty-making power, but the Congress of the United States—accepted that cession, and out of that cession was formed the State of Tennessee.

Now, if the Congress of the United States did not have the power to accept the cession and to annex the territory to the United States because before that it had been the territory of North Carolina, and could take it from any other government as well as North Carolina, certainly, then, the State of Tennessee has never been in the Union and her Representatives upon the floor of this House are trespassers and usurpers. And again, following that, immediately upon the heels of this action was an act of Congress upon the cession made by Georgia.

Georgia had not ceded to the Confederate States the territory which she claimed, and out of that territory was carved and made the State of Alabama. The Congress of the United States, as everybody knows, admitted the Republic of Texas under a resolution to annex the Republic of Texas. That is the language of the resolution. That is the title of the resolution—a resolution "to annex the Territory of Texas."

Mr. DINSMORE. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BARHAM. Yes.

Mr. DINSMORE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that while that was the original title, it was changed before the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BARHAM. It was changed in the act admitting the State into the Union, not in the resolution for annexation. Now, I want the gentleman from Arkansas to give his attention to what he failed to read in the Dred Scott case.

This Dred Scott case came up and was determined by the Supreme Court of the United States after the admission of the territory ceded by North Carolina, after the annexation to the United States of the territory ceded by Georgia, after the Republic of Texas was made a State of the Union, after the acquisition of the Louisiana purchase, after the California purchase, and after Arizona and New Mexico and the Gadsden purchase; with all these facts of history before the Supreme Court of the United States, and the question, in my opinion, being squarely and properly before the court whether a Territory is a State or not—because if Dred Scott and his family had been taken without the jurisdiction of the United States, they were free and no longer slaves—the court rendered that decision.

Now, what does the Supreme Court say, following the declaration of Mr. Madison, at which point the gentleman from Arkansas ceased to read? This is what the court, by Chief Justice Taney, said; and Justice Swaine, following, said that the court discussed no question which was not involved in the determination of the case, which the gentleman from Arkansas forgot also to read. The court says:

We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given, and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory, not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

It is a question for the political department of the Government and not the judicial; and whatever the political department of the Government shall recognize as within the limits of the United States, the judicial department is also bound to recognize, and to administer in it the laws of the United States, so far as they apply, and to maintain in the territory the authority and rights of the Government, and also the personal rights and rights of property of individual citizens, as secured by the Constitution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a direct, positive declaration of the supreme tribunal of the United States upon any proposition, it is shown in that declaration, and I would not now take up the time of the House in discussing this question but for the fact that I do not desire, nor do I think it proper, that the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] should go unchallenged on the floor of the House, except by the statement that the question had heretofore been settled.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, these islands are of very great commercial importance. Our trade in the year 1897 reached $18,500,000, or over $53 for every inhabitant upon the islands. Our whole trade with Uruguay, Peru, Turkey, Portugal, and Greece reaches less than $15,000,000. The whole trade with Chile, Sweden, and Norway is not as great as it is with Hawaii. Our trade with Russia and the three Guianas combined does not equal our trade with the islands. It is greater than our total trade with Central America, or with Spain, Argentina, Switzerland, Venezuela, or Austria, and is equal to our combined trade with Denmark and Colombia.

It is perfectly apparent to my mind that the island can not maintain an independent responsible government. A protectorate over the islands would make this Government liable for the errors of that, without corresponding benefits. So that it seems to me that the question resolves itself into annexation or to quietly sitting by and see England, Japan, Germany, or some other nation take the islands and their trade and military advantages. I think we can not too highly estimate Hawaii from a commercial view, and unless we propose to bottle up and Chinaize this nation, we should not longer hesitate about annexation.

The islands are of great importance from a military point of view. The strategic importance of Hawaii has been demonstrated by facts developed during the pending war with Spain. In order to reach a correct conclusion upon any subject it seems to me that we must seek light from persons, treaties, or commentaries of recognized ability and standing devoted to such subject. If I am sick, I take treatment from doctors learned in medicine. In attempting to work a correct solution of a legal question, the views of writers learned in the law and the opinion of courts of recognized standing and ability are consulted and almost universally followed. So it seems to me, in military and naval affairs, that we should be largely guided by the opinions of men learned and trained upon these subjects.

It is no argument to say that the officers in the Army and Navy can not be relied upon because of their desire for larger acquisitions so as to extend the Army and Navy. They are not subject to this character of criticism. They have just as much interest in the honor, integrity, and perpetuity of this nation as any other of our fellow-citizens, and they are just as loyal and patriotic and brave. It is not argument to say that the opinion of men learned and trained in military and naval affairs are biased and not honest. I think they are just as loyal and true to the best interest of this Government as I am or anyone else in official life. The judgment of our military and naval officers upon the strategic importance of Hawaii are practically unanimous.

I desire to read a portion of the letter of General Schofield, dated January 12, 1898, as follows:

From the time, twenty-five years ago, when I made a personal examination for the purpose of ascertaining the value of those islands to this country for military and naval purposes I have always regarded ultimate annexation of the islands to this country as a public necessity. But the time when this should be accomplished had to depend on natural political development. In the meantime our national interests should be secured by the exclusive right to occupy, improve, and fortify Pearl River Harbor, so as to insure our possession of that harbor in time of war.

To illustrate my views on this subject, I have likened that harbor to a commanding position in front of a defensive line which an army in the field is compelled to occupy. The army must occupy that advanced position and hold it at whatever cost, or else the enemy will occupy it with his artillery, and thus dominate the main line. If we do not occupy and fortify Pearl River Harbor, our enemy will occupy it as a base from which to conduct operations against our Pacific coast and the Isthmian Canal, which must, of course, in due time be constructed and controlled by this country. The position of such a base at a convenient distance from our Pacific coast would be a great temptation to an unfriendly nation to undertake hostile operations against us.

One of the greatest advantages of Pearl River Harbor to us consists in the fact that no navy would be required to defend it.

These views he again expressed before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs a few days before the pending resolutions were reported.

I am in accord with these views. In addition to this, I am satisfied that the Commander in Chief of our Armies, the President of the United States, and his Secretaries of War and Navy, are convinced of the strategic importance of these islands. They proclaim their military importance. If Congress were not in session, no doubt they would forcibly seize the islands as a military necessity.

While these islands can be peacefully accepted by the passage of these resolutions, why should Congress adjourn and compel the President, in order to prosecute the war as he thinks it should be, to forcibly seize the islands? So far as I am concerned, I am willing to remain, and hope Congress will continue in session until these resolutions are adopted, if it takes all summer.

The annexation of Hawaii presents no "entangling alliances."

At this point Jefferson's "entangling alliances" are relied upon by the opposition as a warning, carrying with it sufficient force to frighten us out of the idea of further extension of territory. Did Jefferson mean by "entangling alliances" that the United States should not acquire or extend its territorial limits? If he did mean that, he most certainly forgot to retract it when the United States made the Louisiana purchase.

Should we accept the proposition recently made by Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, secretary of state for the English colonies, this would be an alliance with England. Whether it would prove an "entangling alliance" is a question I will not now pursue. With whom did we ally ourselves when we acquired Louisiana and Texas and California? With whom will we ally ourselves when the Stars and Stripes wave over Hawaii? If we adopt these resolutions, will we necessarily accept Mr. Chamberlain's Anglo-American alliance? I think not. It will only be doing that which should long since have been done and which the war with Spain so fully demonstrates we must do, or sacrifice the unparalleled achievement of our arms upon the seas, so heroically won by Admiral Dewey and his men at Manila, and endanger him, his men, and our soldiers who so recently left the port of San Francisco to aid in holding the fruits of that victory.

When the United States shall take such outlying necessary posts of military defense, and provide herself with a sufficient navy to command the respect of the world, then, and not until then, will we be secured in peace. Let American battle ships plow the furrows through the Atlantic and Pacific, in which shall follow the white wings of American commerce in a peaceful struggle for commercial advantage.

But a great discovery has been made very recently at Unalaska by the opponents of this measure. It is argued the segment of the circle of the earth's surface drawn from San Francisco to the Orient, which passes far to the north of Hawaii, bends more closely to the Aleutian Islands than the Sandwich groups, furnishing the shortest track for vessels, and a coaling station at Unalaska. I prefer to rest my conclusion upon the opinion of men trained and learned in this direction, and content myself with the evidence of Commodore Melville upon this subject. He says: "The point has been made in this debate that there is no advantage in having Honolulu as a port of call on the way to Yokohama and Hongkong, inasmuch as Unalaska, which is already in our own territory, is on the shortest route to the Orient, and therefore we now have a port without annexing any other territory."

This statement is one of those specious half truths which are often worse than absolute errors in deceiving persons who have not possession of all the facts, and I shall now proceed to show that for the purposes of commerce this raising the question of Unalaska is a mere farce.

I shall discuss in a few moments the question of the difference in distance from San Francisco to Yokohama via Honolulu and via Unalaska, but I shall first call attention to the fact that a less desirable port of call than Unalaska would be hard to find. It is situated above the fiftieth parallel of north latitude, and has practically nothing but a harbor to recommend it. There is no trade or commerce, no repair shops; in fact, nothing whatever to attract a great mail steamer proceeding from the metropolis of our Pacific coast to the gateway of the Orient at Yokohama.

Anyone at all familiar is aware that one of the greatest dangers to navigation is fog, and the sea about Unalaska is one of the foggiest regions in the whole world. Probably nearly everybody present has enjoyed reading the poems of Rudyard Kipling known as The Seven Seas, which include a short one called "The rhyme of the seven sealers," and he there depicts in the most graphic style the density of the fog which is found in the neighborhood of this port which my friends have advertised as so desirable as a port of call. Of course I have not rested content with Mr. Kipling's poem alone, but have taken pains to verify the statements there made by inquiring of naval officers and others who have spent considerable time near the Aleutian group, and they have told me that Mr. Kipling's picture is not overdrawn at all.

There are times, however, in the winter when there is clear weather, but then this most attractive port is closed by the ice, for, in spite of the Japan current, which corresponds with the Gulf Stream in the Atlantic, the region around Unalaska is blocked with floe ice. There are, of course, openings in this ice, and vessels that make a business of arctic cruising might utilize them; but it can be readily appreciated that the fine passenger and freight steamers sailing from San Francisco are not going to run this risk.

Now, let us compare with this region of ice and fog the earthly paradise which Hawaii will furnish us. Here there is never a fog, and perpetual summer makes ice a luxury of manufacture. Situated in the belt of the northeast trades, the climate is almost perfect, and navigation is rarely troubled with a storm. Honolulu itself is practically an American city planted in these isles of the Pacific, with all the modern features of civilized life, and already a port of call for several steamship lines. The industries of the island group have built up machine shops that are capable of making almost any of the repairs needed on steam vessels short of complete breakdown of the larger shafts. In other words, we have at Honolulu not only a strong harbor, but all the other features which go to make up a desirable port of call, almost midway in the great ocean which separates our western shores from the Orient.

While a recollection of the geometry we studied in our school days teaches us that a great circle on a sphere is the shortest distance between any two points on its surface, experience in the Atlantic should teach us that this alone would not throw the steamer route in a given direction, and it is a well-known fact to all who have crossed the Pacific that the course now followed by steamers, even when they do not touch Honolulu, is by no means on the great-circle course which goes near Unalaska. The people who run the merchant-steamer lines are very practical, and when they take a given course it is because it means a saving of money to the owners and in length of voyage to the passengers.

On the more southerly route the weather is uniformly fine, and the Pacific deserves its name; but on the route which would be taken if ships went by way of Unalaska there is not only the difficulty of fog and ice, but terrific storms and dangerous rock shoals, which are entirely absent from the more southerly route. It is very safe to say that the line of steamers which would undertake to make the voyage from San Francisco to Yokohama by way of Unalaska would very shortly surrender all its business to those who follow the more southerly routes.

It thus seems to me very clear that the argument against the annexation of Hawaii on the grounds that Unalaska would answer as an intermediate point of call instead of Honolulu is not only utterly untenable, but, in the light of all the facts of the case, simply ridiculous.

As a matter of fact, the great circle track from San Francisco to Yokohama does not pass through Unalaska, but is 370 miles south of it. The distance between San Francisco and Yokohama on the great circle route is something over 4,500 miles, but the majority of tonnage engaged in trans-Pacific navigation passes back and forth along tracks varying in length from about 4,800 to 5,500 miles.

Hitherto, in considering the steamship routes between San Francisco and the Orient, Yokohama has always been the first port of call; but if we consider the possibility that the Philippines may become a part of our possessions, the route via Honolulu would be no farther from the great circle track than that via Unalaska, while, as has already been shown, the conditions are such as to make a northerly route not a matter for serious consideration.

But we are told that in addition to "entangling alliances," to annex Hawaii is to strike a deathblow at the sugar-beet industry in this country. There is no State in the American Union more interested in that subject than is California. Her people are practically unanimous for annexation, notwithstanding the repeated and constant declaration of injury to her beet-sugar industry. The legislature of California which elected Hon. STEPHEN M. WHITE United States Senator in 1893 adopted the following resolutions:

CHAPTER XI.—Senate joint resolution No. 10, relative to annexation of Hawaiian Islands.

[Adopted February 10, 1893.]

Whereas a crisis has arisen in the affairs of the Hawaiian Government, and a desire has been expressed by a large number of the citizens of that Government that their country should be annexed to and become a part of the United States; and

Whereas a delegation of citizens of the Hawaiian Government is now on its way to the national capital to secure such national legislation as will secure the result above suggested; and

Whereas the interests of California and of our entire country would be enhanced by the annexation to our domain of the islands now comprised in the territory of the Hawaiian Kingdom: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate of California, the assembly concurring, That whenever the Hawaiian Government shall signify a desire that its territory should be annexed to and become a part of the territory of the United States, our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use all honorable means at their disposal to bring about such a result upon such terms and conditions as may be most beneficial to the inhabitants of both countries; and further

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the people of the State of California that under no circumstances and under no conditions shall any power other than the United States of America ever be permitted to obtain any control or protectorate over the islands comprising the territory of said Hawaiian Kingdom.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to immediately telegraph these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives at Washington.

The desire for annexation has greatly increased and is practically unanimous now.

The people of California know full well that there is not the slightest truth in the declaration, and hence have no fears in that direction. The islands produce cane sugar, not beet sugar. Add all the cane sugar which it is possible to produce in those islands to the product of the cane in Louisiana and elsewhere in the Union, and we must still import much cane sugar into the United States, for purposes for which beet sugar can not and will not be used, and of course there is not and can not be any competition between the cane sugar of the islands and the beet sugar of California.

In round numbers the people of the United States consume annually 2,000,000 tons of sugar. The total product of this country is less than 336,000 tons.

The highest importation of sugar from the islands was reached in 1897, and amounted to less than 200,000 tons, or 9 per cent of the total consumption in the United States.

By the report of the Secretary of Agriculture it is shown that Hawaii has reached its maximum in the production of sugar, and taking into consideration the character of cultivation, the exhaustion of the soil, and the cost of fertilizers in the islands, the Secretary concludes, and I think properly, that the production would decrease instead of increase.

There must annually be produced over 1,500,000 tons of sugar in the United States before we can equal the consumption, without taking into consideration the increase of consumption. Secretary Wilson proceeds to show that the soil of this country is not exhausted by the sugar industry, and says:

These considerations lead me to conclude that the system of agriculture pursued in Hawaii, which is certainly reducing the fertility of the soil, can not compete with a system of farm management in the United States, where the fertility of the soil is not at all reduced.

So I think I am amply justified in saying that the people of the Pacific coast have no reason to fear competition from the islands. But the Chinese and Japanese are held up as an all impending danger if we acquire the islands. Why? Oh, because it is said the Chinese will literally overrun the country. Any one who will read the pending resolutions must know that this can not be so.

The Chinese now upon the island are expressly prohibited from coming from there into this country by the provisions of the resolutions, and after annexation further Chinese immigration into these islands is also prohibited by existing law. But we are told that the Japanese will swarm in upon us if we take the islands. There is less than nothing in this proposition. All of the Japanese in the world can now come into the United States without the slightest obstruction, just as freely and as legally as the English, Germans, French, or anybody else, so that that scarecrow is lowered while the Stars and Stripes is being raised over Hawaii.

Mr. Speaker, the milestone marking the close of the nineteenth century finds America facing problems undreamt of when Washington penned his immortal address. We must advance. The commerce of the future demands way stations on its transportation lines. Before the commencement of the twentieth century let the flag of our country be waving over Hawaii in the Pacific and Puerto Rico in the Atlantic, and the two oceans be connected by the Nicaragua Canal, constructed, maintained, and operated under American ownership and American control, [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, perhaps a few words of a historical character may not be out of place in the discussion of Hawaiian matters. There are some facts concerning this question that should not be lost sight of, and the part that some of my people bore in the first steps taken in relation to the civilization of Hawaii it would be well to mention.

The early history of the Hawaiian Islands is involved in great obscurity, and the best efforts to obtain a reliable history is attended with great difficulties and with uncertain results.

Some of the facts pertaining to the Hawaiians which reflect credit upon us ought to be more fully known. In 1809 two natives of the Hawaiian Islands attached themselves to an American trader commanded by Captain Brintnel, of New Haven, Conn. These young natives soon found sympathy with the people of New Haven, and were somewhat impressed with the attention they received, not only from the citizens of New Haven, but from the students of Yale University, who offered to teach them. They accepted the advantages offered, and success crowned the efforts of the students. One of these natives was a homeless orphan, his father and mother having been killed by a victorious party (in the youth's presence) in a bloody strife to see which should be the greatest.

These young natives of Hawaii became so impressed with our Christian civilization that they soon became converts to the Christian faith. This soon became known to the American Board of Foreign Missions, who looked upon the landing and presence of these natives as providential, in view of the fact that they appeared to be anxious to learn our ways and our faith as to Christian duty.

This gave rise to the idea in the American Board of Missions of establishing a school in Cornwall, Conn., where all foreign, aboriginal, or heathen tribes could be educated. This school had as students the young natives whom Captain Brintnel brought to New Haven. This school, established by the American Board, sent out a number of missionaries to convert and civilize the natives of Hawaii. In 1823 a body of missionaries, under the auspices of the American Board of Foreign Missions, went forth from the old Center Church, of New Haven, Conn., to civilize and Christianize the natives of the island. This mission was a great success and firmly established Christianity in Hawaii. The voyage from New Haven to Honolulu occupied one hundred and fifty-eight days.

The departure of these missionaries, as I have said, took place in 1823. In 1836 a letter was received by the American board, showing in a marked degree the effects of the missionaries in Hawaii, which ought to be recalled as a stimulant to those who help along the cause of missions and civilization. The letter is signed by fifteen leading natives of Hawaii, and is as follows:

LAHAINA, August 23, 1836.

Love to you, our obliging friends in America. This is our sentiment as to promoting the order and prosperity of these Hawaiian Islands. Do give us additional teachers, like the teachers who dwell in your own country. These are the teachers whom we would specify: A carpenter, tailor, mason, shoemaker, wheelwright, paper maker, type founder, agriculturists skilled in raising cane, cotton, and silk, and in making sugar; cloth manufacturers, and makers of machinery to work on a large scale, and a teacher of the chiefs in what pertains to the land, according to the practice of enlightened countries, and if there be any other teachers that could be serviceable in these matters, such teachers also.

Should you assent to our request and send hither these specified teachers, then will we protect them and grant facilities for their occupation, and we will back up these works that they may succeed well.

Some twenty-four years ago, when the King, Kalakaua, came to this country, he was for a short time a guest at my house. One of the first places he wished to see was the Center Church, at New Haven, from which the missionaries went forth to Christianize the island, at the same time remarking that the band of men sent forth from New Haven in 1823 had been the salvation of Hawaii.

A few years ago, when the Center Church was remodeled and repaired, the old pulpit in which the band of missionaries stood to receive the benediction, good will, and Godspeed of the people was sent to Hawaii, and is now to be seen in the church at Honolulu established by the missionaries. Truly it is a memento at least and greatly cherished by the people of Honolulu.

Another incident worth mentioning at this time, in order to show what part Americans have taken in the affairs of Hawaii, is the part that Captain Brintnel, of New Haven, Conn., took when in the harbor of Honolulu to aid the King of the island (who was residing at Honolulu) to bring the islands of the Sandwich group under one government.

With cannon mounted on the deck of his vessel, by and under the command of the King and his followers, these islands of the Pacific were brought under one government, and have so remained from that time to this. Truly, if I were to speak of all the incidents that have occurred in which Americans have taken part in Hawaii and the good that has been done (now that the islands are offered us), we could not withhold our votes for its annexation. We would simply call it ours, and take it.

I am sorry to take up the time of the House in relating incidents and facts pertaining to the Hawaiian Islands. Yet these facts should not be forgotten. I am one among others in this House who will vote to annex Hawaii. It seems to me that we can not well avoid doing so. The use of steam instead of sail on our great battle ships exacts this. I will not repeat arguments already made on this floor favoring the annexation of Hawaii. It is unnecessary.

It is, in my opinion, one of the demands of the times. We are making history. It may not be observed by all, but we are making it fast. The thoughts of one year ago are not the thoughts of to-day. Times are changing. I do not know what the future will be, or what questions will arise, but out of this war will come new questions which will demand our utmost skill and courage to handle. The one question is now the annexation of Hawaii. I do not believe it can or should be resisted or deferred any longer. It seems to me the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has made our course clear, and to resist or neglect that which seems an imperative duty to many would amount to almost a national wrong. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD].

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, the question under consideration by the House is one that has attracted the attention of our leading statesmen as well as Presidents and Cabinet officers for more than a half century.

The right of the United States to annex territory will scarcely be seriously disputed. The Constitution of the United States, it may be said, is silent upon that subject so far as the direct power to annex territory is given. The only provision touching upon this question is the one by which it is declared that Congress "may admit new States;" but it is clear that those who have given thought and attention to this subject in the past have held that the right to acquire additional territory by the Government of the United States was one of the inherent rights that belong to sovereign countries and that this right belongs to the United States as well as to Great Britain, France, Germany, or any other of the great powers of the world.

We have from time to time extended the boundaries of the original thirteen colonies, and we have increased the territorial limits of the United States until in territorial extent we are at least three times as large as at the close of the Revolutionary war, and when the United States was first recognized by Great Britain in 1783 as an independent sovereignty.

We began acquiring territory in 1803, when France ceded to us the Territory of Louisiana, followed by the cession to us of what is now the State of Florida by Spain in 1819. Then in chronological order we annexed Texas in 1845, then we acquired, in 1848, by cession from Mexico, the large tract of our country lying on the Pacific, followed by what is known as the "Gadsden purchase" in 1853, while Alaska was ceded to us by Russia in 1867.

These several acquisitions of territory from time to time, as I before remarked, have largely extended the boundaries of this country, made it great and powerful, and added population, strength, and wealth. There are none of these several acquisitions that have ever, in any manner, given us as a people anything but strength and power.

But it is said that the territory just spoken of was within the limits or boundaries of North America; and the question is raised as to whether we have the right to go outside of the boundary lines of the continent and acquire in any way territory that is not, to use a phrase that comes down to us from the forefathers, "contiguous territory." There is nothing in the Constitution that prevents us from annexing the Sandwich Islands, or in fact annexing any other territory that may seem to be of advantage to us. It is a matter alone of policy, and, I think, in some degree, a matter of sentiment.

As to the Hawaiian Islands, the question of remoteness does not lie against them except in a relative way. These islands are nearer to the United States than to any other great power. It is apparent that they can not longer remain as an independent country; and the question forces itself upon us at this time as to whether these islands, being nearer to us than to any other great power, shall be taken by us and governed and controlled by the laws and institutions of the United States, and by our people, or whether they shall pass under the dominion of Japan, or of England, or of some other country that will hold them as a part of its realm.

We had a treaty entered into with the existing Government of Hawaii in 1896 by which this group of islands was offered to us by the controlling power in the Government of Hawaii, and a treaty was formulated during the Administration of President Harrison by which these islands were to be annexed to the United States and to become a part of this country. In transmitting this treaty to the Senate for confirmation, President Harrison, speaking of the then disturbed condition of things in the islands, among other things said:

The influence and interest of the United States in the islands must be increased and not diminished. Only two courses are now open—one, the establishment of a protectorate by the United States, and the other, annexation full and complete. I think the latter course, which has been adopted in the treaty, will be highly promotive of the best interests of the Hawaiian people, and is the only one that will adequately secure the interests of the United States. These interests are not wholly selfish. It is essential that none of the great powers shall secure these islands. Such a possession would not consist with our safety and with the peace of the world.

President Harrison, as it would seem, had very seriously considered the situation of these islands and the relations existing between them and the United States. He had in view, no doubt, their intrinsic value, but no doubt to a much greater degree their strategic importance. His great Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, dealt with this question also, and in correspondence with our minister at Honolulu, in a dispatch dated December, 1891, he made use of the following emphatic language upon the subject of our relations with the Hawaiian Islands:

This Government firmly believes that the position of the Hawaiian Islands, as the key to the dominion of the American Pacific, demands their benevolent neutrality, to which end it will earnestly cooperate with the native Government. And if, through any cause, the maintenance of such a position of benevolent neutrality should be found by Hawaii to be impracticable, this Government would then unhesitatingly meet the altered situation by seeking an avowedly American solution for the grave issues presented.

In a further dispatch he said:

The Government of the United States * * * has always avowed and now repeats that under no circumstances will it permit the transfer of the territory or sovereignty of these islands to any of the great European powers. It is needless to restate the reasons upon which that determination rests. It is too obvious for argument that the possession of these islands by a great maritime power would not only be a dangerous diminution of the just and necessary influence of the United States in the waters of the Pacific, but in the case of international difficulty it would be a positive threat to interests too large and important to be lightly risked.

There is little doubt that were the Hawaiian Islands, by annexation or district protection, a part of the territory of the Union, their fertile resources for the growth of rice and sugar would not only be controlled by American capital, but so profitable a field of labor would attract intelligent workers thither from the United States.

Throughout the continent, north and south, wherever a foothold is found for American enterprise, it is quickly occupied, and this spirit of adventure, which seeks its outlet in the mines of South America and the railroads of Mexico, would not be slow to avail itself of openings for assured and profitable enterprise even in midocean.

And we have had, Mr. Speaker, very few men who studied more the broad relations that this country has to the countries lying contiguous to us than Secretary Blaine. And I commend the opinions of this broad-minded statesman and enthusiastic American to gentlemen on the other side who are here doubting the propriety of annexing these islands and who see nothing but disaster to follow from territorial expansion.

Though our flag was run up at Honolulu during the Administration of President Harrison, and the people of these islands were asking admission to our Union and asking for protection and looking to us for safety, after the Administration of Mr. Cleveland came in, he sent a former member of the House of Representatives to Honolulu to consider what no other President of the United States had ever considered and I trust no President ever will consider again—the propriety of taking down the American flag where it had been raised by loyal hands; and after consideration, in defiance of the protests of the minister of this country and upon the advice of his special emissary, the flag was hauled down, the protection of the United States withdrawn from the country, and so it has remained to this day.

After President McKinley had been inaugurated and entered upon the duties of his office, another treaty of annexation was negotiated with the Hawaiian Government. And in transmitting this treaty President McKinley spoke at length as to the policy of incorporating the Hawaiian Islands into the body politic of the nation, and of the great necessity there was of excluding other great powers from making a permanent lodging in these islands. I quote from his message transmitting the treaty as follows:

Not only is the union of the Hawaiian territory to the United States no new scheme, but it is the inevitable consequence of the relation steadfastly maintained with that mid-Pacific domain for three-quarters of a century. Its accomplishment, despite successive denials and postponements, has been merely a question of time. While its failure in 1893 may not be a cause of congratulation, it is certainly a proof of the disinterestedness of the United States, the delay of four years having abundantly sufficed to establish the right and the ability of the Republic of Hawaii to enter, as a sovereign contractant, upon a conventional union with the United States, as thus realizing a purpose held by the Hawaiian people and proclaimed by successive Hawaiian Governments through some twenty years of their virtual dependence upon the benevolent protection of the United States. Under such circumstances annexation is not a change. It is a consummation.

Secretary Sherman, in his report accompanying the annexation treaty of 1897, and in summing up upon this subject, said:

There remained, therefore, the annexation of the islands and their complete absorption into the political system of the United States as the only solution satisfying all the given conditions and promising permanency and mutual benefit. The present treaty has been framed on that basis, thus substantially reverting to the original proposal of 1893, and necessarily adopting many of the features of that arrangement. As to most of these the negotiators have been constrained and limited by the constitutional powers of the Government of the United States.

I give these extracts, Mr. Speaker, as showing the opinion of some of the leading minds of the country who have given thought to this subject in a general way, covering, as they did, no doubt, the intrinsic value of these islands, their commercial value, as well as their great strategic importance.

The trade of these islands with the United States during the last fiscal year amounted to $18,000,000, and this amounted to more than 75 per cent of the entire trade of the islands.

But these islands are capable of very great development in the future; and if they are once touched by the quickening hand of American thrift and industry, they will, no doubt, quadruple their trade relations with this country. The coffee plant that flourishes in these islands is capable of very great development, and of a very great development with very little capital. There are also other industries that will spring up in these islands that will make them valuable to us in the way of business.

It has been said, however, that the annexation of these islands would in some way greatly interfere with the beet-sugar development in this country; and we have a great business in this country, or, as our friends on the other side of the House term it, a great "trust," that has been appealing to the farmers of the United States especially to resist the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands because it would be detrimental to the beet-sugar industry.

Just one word as to "the milk" there is in that particular "cocoanut." There is a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, procured very largely, no doubt, through the influence of the sugar refiners of the United States, by which raw sugars of a certain standard and quality are admitted free of duty into the United States. A very great portion of the products of these islands come into our country duty free because of this treaty and of the quality of the sugar.

These sugars go entirely to the great refiners that are organized into what is denominated a "trust," and they have grown immensely rich in the last few years. They refine the sugars and put them on the market in the United States. Now, mark, this great trust—or the sugar-refining interests—succeeded in getting into the tariff legislation known as the Wilson bill, as well as into the last tariff bill, a good round protective duty upon refined sugars. So that, as things exist to-day, the sugar trust is enabled to get the Hawaiian raw sugars free of duty, and at the same time sugar refiners in Germany or in Hawaii, if there be any there, are compelled to pay a tariff upon their refined product. And so the great "sugar trust" is very seriously concerned about the beet-sugar industry of the United States, and you can judge for yourselves, gentlemen of the House, as to whether this concern is to the interest of the farmer or of the gentlemen who refine the sugars.

But, further than this, these islands will never be a dangerous competitor to the beet-sugar industry for the reasons given in an article that I shall quote from by Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, a gentleman who has given this subject more thought than any other man in the country, and a gentleman devoted to the interests of the farmers, and especially to the farmers of the West. I quote from an open letter addressed to the Evening Star, of this city, of January 19 last, in which he speaks of the competition of Hawaiian sugar with the beet-sugar product of the United States. He said, among other things:

These considerations led me to conclude that the system of agriculture pursued in Hawaii, which is certainly reducing the fertility of the soil, can not compete with a system of farm management in the United States, where the fertility of the soil is not at all reduced. We consume in the United States about 2,000,000 tons of sugar. Something like a million acres devoted to this purpose would produce all the sugar we import into our country at the present time, or 10 acres grown on each one of 100,000 farms, in rotation with other crops, would meet home demands and do no injury to the soils.

The American farmer will use this crop to diversify his farm system. The Hawaiian sugar grower is a one-crop man, and wherever one crop is perpetually grown, be it wheat or maize, beets or cane, cotton or tobacco, the available plant food in the soil is certain to be reduced below the point of profitable production and fertilizers are required.

And also, in speaking of the possibilities of the climate of these islands, said:

Hawaii, then, will not seriously compete with sugar producers in the States. When the people of those islands come to consider, with scientific assistance, the possibilities of coffee production that can be extended over much of the limited sugar belt, it will be found that in that industry they have a monopoly with which no State in the Union can interfere. It is a singular fact that no scientific improvement of the coffee tree with regard to the excellence of the berry and increased yield of the tree through intelligent selections has ever been made. The climate of these islands is admirably adapted to the production of many fine fruits that can not be grown in any of our States. They can grow many choice subtropical and tropical fruits that have never been scientifically developed, the improvement of which would lead to very profitable production. In these directions the farmers of the States could not compete with Hawaii.

These islands are, no doubt, far more valuable in a commercial way than they seem to be at the present time. There are, no doubt, many undeveloped riches in the Hawaiian Islands that will be developed in the future.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House who are never interested in the labor of this country when they come to consider questions relating to the protection of labor by levying duties upon imported goods or who have very little interest in protecting labor against the foreign immigration that is thrown upon our shores from year to year, when they come to consider this question are alarmed because 100,000 inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands will in some way be brought in conflict with American labor.

I do not suppose that any of the inhabitants of Hawaii will migrate to this country, certainly not the laborers of these islands. They will not compete with the farmers in raising grain, because they do not raise grain. They will not compete with the men who make iron and steel and glass, and who are engaged in the great manufacturing industries of the country, because these people themselves are not manufacturers, and they are not workmen in such fields of labor. They will, no doubt, continue to raise sugar, and in the future more than in the past, no doubt, will grow the coffee plant, and in some ways add to the riches and wealth of the country; but they can never come in competition with the labor of the United States that needs protection, and that we on this side of the House have been endeavoring to protect from time to time against foreign competition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the question that is of more vital importance, in my opinion, than the intrinsic value of these islands themselves, or than the mere trade relations we will ever have with the people of Hawaii. I refer now to the great strategic importance of these islands in time of war. It must be apparent to everyone who will stop for a moment to consider present conditions in the Pacific that the possession of these islands at this time by a hostile power, or even by a power that was strictly neutral, would be a very great disadvantage to us. The Government of Hawaii is not neutral in the contest that is now going on between Spain and the United States, but they are our friends.

They permit our ships to enter the harbor of Honolulu without question, and to remain there as long as they please. We took thousands of tons of coal and deposited it there for the use of our ships of war, and the fleet of vessels that left the Pacific coast a few days ago stopped at Honolulu and replenished their coal bunkers, and went on their way to the relief of Dewey at Manila. If these islands were in the possession of a hostile power, or even a neutral power, we would be compelled to make the entire distance of more than 7,000 miles from San Francisco to Manila Bay without the opportunity of re-coaling our vessels. In the olden times, when the winds blew our ships around the world and across the seas, a friendly harbor for our vessels of war was not of the great and essential importance that it is now.

We rush our ships across the oceans by steam, and it is necessary to have coaling stations wherever we desire to operate with our Navy. The Spaniards who are now beleaguered in the harbor of Santiago no doubt sought that harbor for the reason that their coal bunkers were empty, or nearly so. The Spaniard left his own country and came across the ocean to protect his possessions in Cuba and Puerto Rico. He finds himself without the means of further propelling his men-of-war, and is at a very great disadvantage. What would have become of Dewey and his fleet after they were ordered out of a neutral port had they not been able by a wonderful stroke of courage, as well as fortune, to find a harbor of the enemy into which they could enter and remain as long as they chose?

But upon this question we have the opinions of the great soldiers and sailors of the country as to the great strategic importance of the Hawaiian Islands. I read a short extract from the opinion of one of the leading soldiers of the country upon this point—General Schofield:

From the time, twenty-five years ago, when I made a personal examination for the purpose of ascertaining the value of those islands to this country for military and naval purposes, I have always regarded ultimate annexation of the islands to this country as a public necessity. But the time when this should be accomplished had to depend on natural, political development. In the meantime our national interests should be secured by the exclusive right to occupy, improve, and fortify Pearl River Harbor, so as to insure our possession of that harbor in time of war.

To illustrate my views on this subject, I have likened that harbor to a commanding position in front of a defensive line which an army in the field is compelled to occupy. The army must occupy that advanced position and hold it, at whatever cost, or else the enemy will occupy it with his artillery and thus dominate the main line. If we do not occupy and fortify Pearl River Harbor, our enemy will occupy it as a base from which to conduct operations against our Pacific coast and the Isthmian Canal, which must, of course, in due time be constructed and controlled by this country. The possession of such a base at a convenient distance from our Pacific coast would be a great temptation to an unfriendly nation to undertake hostile operations against us.

Also to the opinion of Chief Engineer Melville, of the Navy, as to the great strategic advantage of these islands:

To the westward the acquisition by Germany of a commanding position on the Shan-Tung Promontory, and the rumored desire for Hai-Nan by another Government, with the occupation since 1842 of Hongkong by the British point to the seemingly inevitable Europeanizing of the long littoral of China. Northward of that Empire Russia marches steadily on, pushing her Siberian railway to completion, extending her already vast resources and strength at Vladivostok, wintering her fleet at Port Arthur, and apparently entering into the affairs, domestic and foreign, of the Korean Peninsula.

In place, then, of facing China, peaceful, and in war inert, with no force to dispatch far afield by sea or land, and Japan, eager, brilliant, but yet young and weak, there will presently confront the United States on its western as well as its eastern shore the powers of Europe, with their relatively large fleets and home reserves established, not only in the far East, but in many of the nearer Pacific islands, the acquisition of which in these later years has been not a "blind grab for territory," but in pursuit of definite strategic aims. To these forces on the west there must be added also that of the New Japan, whose navy will soon surpass our own in fighting power.

I desire to refer those who object to the annexation of these islands for the reason that we will require a greater navy in the Pacific after acquiring these islands than before, to the opinion, or rather to the testimony, of Captain Mahan on this subject, given before the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

In replying to the second question, I must guard myself from being understood to think our present Pacific fleet great enough for probable contingencies. With this reservation a greater navy would not be needed for the defense of the Pacific coast than would be required with the islands unannexed. If we have the islands, and in the Pacific a fleet of proper force, the presence of the latter, or of an adequate detachment from it, at the Hawaiian Islands will materially weaken, if not wholly cripple, any attempted invasion of the Pacific coast (except from British Columbia), and consequently will proportionately strengthen us. With a fleet of the same size and Hawaii unoccupied by either party, the enemy would at least be in a better position to attack us, while if he succeeded in establishing himself in any of our coast anchorages he would be far better off. For in the latter case the islands would not menace his communications with home, which they would if in our possession, because Hawaii flanks the communications.

It is obvious also that if we do not hold the islands ourselves we can not expect the neutrals in the war to prevent the other belligerents from occupying them; nor can the inhabitants themselves prevent such occupation. The commercial value is not great enough to provoke neutral intervention. In short, in war we should need a larger navy to defend the Pacific coast, because we should have not only to defend our own coast, but to prevent, by naval force, an enemy from occupying the islands; whereas if we preoccupied them, fortifications could preserve them to us.

Whilst I said, Mr. Speaker, that these islands are of great importance in time of war, yet I do not by any means concede that this is simply a war measure. I believe that we should have these islands without reference to the present war with Spain. I know that there has been a change, and a very great one, in the sentiment of our people upon this subject since the breaking out of the Spanish war. But men who looked at the broad questions that are now concerning us as a great people, men like President Harrison, President McKinley, Secretary Blaine, and many others, regarded these islands as of very great importance to us before the outbreak of the Spanish war.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that the way to insure peace is to prepare for war. I am not sure but that there is great truth in this saying. To-day the great powers of Europe are armed as they never were before, armed specially on the seas, and they are confronting one another now in the far East with mighty battleships, with shotted guns, and all that goes to make up and to show the great and mighty strength of these powers. China, that pursued its own way in the world, and built its walls, put up its gates, and thought to have nothing to do with the outside world, finds itself prostrate now. The great powers of Europe are shaking down its gates and despoiling China of its territory. Who are these powers that are to-day despoiling China? They, every one of them, are Christian nations; all fly the banner of the Prince of Peace; and yet the great and powerful nations of the earth are depending to-day upon the weight of their artillery and upon the power and swiftness of their mighty ships of war.

Now, as to the United States. What are we to do in the great future that is opening up to the world? Men may sit down and write homilies of the good old days of the past and talk about entangling alliances with the powers of Europe and deprecate the spirit of jingoism that is abroad in the world, yet we must either move along with the procession or we will find ourselves some day, perhaps, in the position that China finds herself at the present time. No matter what homilies politicians may write, no matter how much we may talk about the good old days of our fathers and about our isolation and about our great growth in the century that is just passing away, yet the truth remains that the people of the United States are moving forward with strides more rapid than ever before at any time in our history.

The past century has prepared us for being one of the very great powers of the world. I believe, and believe it from evidence that I think ought to be apparent to everyone, that we will be the leading power of the world within the next quarter of a century and that the time is coming when we will have no peer among the nations of the world. For a hundred years the American people were engaged in subduing the wilderness, driving out the savage, and that, together with the experience of our great civil war—the greatest war of modern times—made us the most alert nation of people that the world has ever known. We are no longer content with the pastoral conditions of our fathers. We have ceased to be a country or a people producing simply grain and cotton and other raw materials, but we are to-day almost, if not quite, in the van of the great manufacturing nations of the world.

Our people are acute and alert. They are pushing forward into every line of trade or business. We have crossed the continent, and our people are straining their eyes from the Golden Gate into the Pacific. There they intend to and will carry their trade. There their manufactures will go. We will meet Russia at Port Arthur. We will get much of the trade that will go into that great country through the trans-Siberian railroad. Russia has just sent an order to the United States for fifty locomotives for the use of that railroad. She is having built on the Pacific coast two war ships that are to duplicate the Oregon. We will, no doubt, be brought into close trade relations not only with Russia, but with all the countries that are now seeking trade around the Orient. I do not say this in a spirit of boasting, but I believe that the United States, especially in the manufacture of machinery, and especially of all things that tend to aid and save labor, is now and will in the future be the leader among all the countries of the world.

Political parties can not prevent this. It may be a question, and is a question now, as to what the future has in store for us. We may be going in a direction that will prove to be one that will bring great anxiety to us in the future; but I believe that we will in the outcome win for the trade and business of the United States a place that we have never had heretofore. I should like to see a political convention or a political party attempt to stem the present current of events in this country. I do not believe that it can be done. I believe that we will not only annex Hawaii but that we will retain in the Philippine Islands; if not the entire group, that we will maintain a supremacy and a power there that will give us a harbor and will enable us to protect with our fleet our commerce in the far East.

The trade balances in our favor this fiscal year are surprising. We are selling more abroad and buying less from other countries than at any other time in our history compared with the general business one way and the other. We will sell within the present fiscal year twelve hundred millions of dollars of the products of our labor and of our skill, while we are buying from abroad but six hundred millions. And we are not only selling abroad our grain, our petroleum, and what may be regarded as raw material, but we are selling abroad the work of our shops and of our mills. We are placing ourselves in trade relations with other countries, not alone through our breadstuffs and our cotton and the like, but through our manufactures.

And so I say, Mr. Speaker, that the destiny of this country is toward further evolution and greater development. I believe the hand that is raised to stay this evolution and to stay this development will be an idle hand indeed. As I remarked some time back, this movement of the people in trade and business, and in the direction that tends toward territorial aggrandizement and territorial expansion, is not born of political parties. It did not come as the declaration of platforms. Indeed, the people of the United States in their business affairs, in their business methods, in the development of the country, in the evolution of our people from a mere pastoral people to one engaged in skilled labor and skilled industry, has not been developed to a very great extent through political parties; but it has been a development that came naturally from the alert, keen business sense of the American people.

The very management of our ships of war, the keen-sighted officers and sailors on our fleets, are far more than a match for the dull-brained Spaniard, although he is equal in courage, perhaps, to the American or to any other people on the face of the earth. We are still a growing people; we are still developing, and we will continue to develop until we have reached the very highest point to which a people can go.

I believe that our institutions are more capable of standing the strain of great enterprises and of wonderful developments than any nation that has preceded us. We will always carry with us wherever we go the liberty of the Declaration of Independence, the principles of the Constitution, the liberty that is lawful, that is not licensed merely, but that is founded solely and entirely upon the free and expressed will of the majority of the people.

No such nation and no such country has ever been tried before with any of the problems that confront us now. And so, Mr. Speaker, I do not see ahead of us the storms and the trouble that are predicted from a policy of territorial expansion. Whilst I speak only for myself, I have no fears of territorial expansion. I have no fear that any harm will come to this country from the annexation of Hawaii, from the taking of Puerto Rico, from the annexation of Cuba in due time, and from maintaining our flag at Manila. These questions, however, are questions of the future that I have no doubt will be dealt with in the same spirit—the same broad-minded spirit that has characterized our country in the past.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, after thirty years of peace at home and abroad we are to-day in the midst of war's alarm; the drumbeat and the bugle call once more resound throughout the land; gathering hosts are hurrying to the front; Old Glory waves over American soldiers marching in battle array; on our ships of war, more deadly than ever before, the crews stand ready for action; a naval victory, unique in the history of warfare, has placed the name of Dewey with those of Farragut, Decatur, and Nelson, and those of Bagley and Hobson fill the world with admiration.

Another brilliant page is about to be added to the history of American triumph by land and sea over a hostile foe. Our arms are turned no longer against American soldiers and brethren in other States of the Union. The struggle is not maintained, as in the civil war, against the perpetuity of the American Government and the preservation of free institutions. We stand a united people in a united cause for a united purpose, to extend the privileges of liberty to an oppressed people from the cruelty of a country which has for hundreds of years been a disgrace to the civilization of the world, and to avenge an act of barbarism of which no other nation on earth would have been guilty save Spain.

Side by side are the companies and regiments and brigades from the North and South. Northern soldiers will march under WHEELER and Lee, and Southern troops will fight with Miles and Merritt. On the quarter-deck and in the gun rooms of our cruisers and battle ships will stand the men whose homes are on the Gulf with the men whose homes are on the Lakes. We have become a homogeneous people with one aim, one aspiration—the honor and glory of a common country.

Thirty-five years ago the melodies of Dixie went up from one side of the armed fortifications, while the music of the Star Spangled Banner floated upward from the other. To-day the strains of both are heard in every camp and float across the water from every seacoast city on the oceans and the Gulf. In the armies which will ere long be marching through the Cuban Island will be found the children of Southern slaves, the children of their masters and of those who set them free, guided by a common purpose, with a common motto, "Cuba libre."

LESSONS TO BE DRAWN FROM PRESENT WAR.

From such a war we can not, if we are wise, but draw lessons for our future conduct as a nation. We have slept for thirty years contented with our internal resources, strong in our material growth and development, self-confident to meet any struggle in which we should be called to engage. We have reasoned that our isolation from the great powers of the other hemisphere would continue to be our protection and our strength. We have forgotten the mighty progress which has been made in bringing more closely together the remotest corners of the earth.

With no occasion to demand them, we have failed to keep abreast of the progress of the rest of the world in offensive and defensive preparations for war. While the first little monitor, the product of American invention and genius, has revolutionized naval warfare, we have allowed ourselves to fall behind in our naval equipment until we have ceased to rank among the leaders in the matter of naval strength, and even the antagonism of a sixth-rate power has found us unprepared for immediate action and filled with solicitude for immediate results.

In the advancement of modern military science requiring months of preparation for the emplacement of modern batteries in our seacoast fortifications and years for the construction of naval vessels and their armament and the manufacture of high-power explosives, we can not afford, in time of peace, to neglect these great works until the call to war shall sound. When the Maine was blown up by the Spanish assassins not enough powder and shells were in the hands of the Ordnance Department to fight a single day's battle; not a fortification along the coast was in a condition to sustain the bombardment of a hostile fleet; not a sufficient force of troops, drilled and disciplined for active service, was at the disposal of the General Commanding the Armies for an invasion of Cuba. It has taken more than a hundred days of constant, unremitting, strenuous work to reach the point where we may feel that we are at last prepared for offensive movements. I believe that this lesson will not have to be again repeated to the American people.

In the history of England we read of one monarch, a Saxon king, who, surrounded by foreign foes, by procrastination failed to place his people in a proper condition to meet them, and his reign was a prolonged series of disasters. So conspicuous was this neglect that he has come down to us under the name of "Ethelred the Unready." We have within our own experience seen even modern nations guilty of a similar blunder. France was overrun by Germany, China defeated by Japan, because they had not in time of peace properly prepared for time of war. Pray God that never in our history shall we be found, in a contest with a foreign nation, so unworthy as to be called "The United States the Unready." We have been dangerously near it in the present instance.

True, it costs vast sums of money to provide and maintain a naval armament and a coast defense which will put us on a fair footing of equality with the European powers; but the cost of hurried preparation, the expense of organizing and maintaining a great army called together for an emergency, is far in excess of the outlay which would be required to place ourselves in a state of preparation in times of peace such as would make unnecessary in most, if not all, cases a state of war.

NECESSITY OF COALING STATIONS.

Another lesson which comes home to us is the fact that it would not do for us as a nation to ignore the necessity of acquiring and maintaining in other parts of the world, even though remote from our shores, places of rest and supply for the vessels of our Navy. In the days of Nelson and Decatur, when the wind was the only motive power, cruises of months or years could be made by a naval fleet without the necessity of stopping at a port. But with the introduction of steam and the harnessing of the lightning to perform so many of the functions of a ship of war the usefulness of a fleet or vessel is limited by its capacity to carry its own supply of coal.

However magnificent and almost invulnerable a modern battle ship may seem to be, it becomes a helpless derelict upon the face of the waters when its bunkers are empty of coal and its supply station remote. Were the necessities of our naval service confined to our own immediate waters this would be perhaps a matter of little concern to us, for so long as our mines yield their stored-up treasures and our great railroad systems carry their black but precious loads to our seaboard, our ships of war could supply their needs under the protection of skillfully equipped and well-manned coast defenses. [Applause.]

REVIVAL OF MERCHANT MARINE.

But we should not forget that the hope is cherished that at no remote time in the future the great merchant marine of the United States shall again be rebuilt; that our commerce will be found on every ocean and in every inlet floating on American bottoms; that American citizens will be found either in the pursuit of business or pleasure in every city in every corner of the earth. It will be our duty to spread the protection of this glorious banner of freedom over every American, however humble; over every American vessel, however remote.

To do this will require an American Navy to enforce our just demands and command the respect of even the most powerful nation. We shall build more ships, we shall train more men for this service, we shall make our coasts invulnerable, and we shall rank among the most powerful instead of among the weakest in our military and naval strength. Not for aggression, except in the cause of right; not for oppression or territorial aggrandizement, but for the enforcement of justice to our own people and protection of liberty and free government to the countries of this Western Hemisphere. With this necessity for the promotion of our naval welfare are intimately associated two great subjects which have demanded the attention of the American nation and which the present war will no doubt bring to a fitting conclusion—the annexation of Hawaii and the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal.

NICARAGUAN CANAL.

Their necessity has come home to us as it never could had it not been for the experience of the last three months. The run of our magnificent battle ship, the Oregon, through 13,000 miles of water, amidst not only the perils of the sea, but of the danger of attack by a hostile fleet, is a wonderful one in the history of naval warfare. But how many sighs have gone up, how many apprehensions have been felt for her safety and that of her men, which might have been spared had the shorter route through the Nicaraguan Canal been given her. We are sending relief to the gallant Dewey, adequate, I hope, even should a Spanish fleet be sent to the Philippines to recover those islands.

With the great canal across the isthmus it would be at least an even race and a fair chance for our Atlantic fleet to succor Dewey and his gallant men. We need it for the proper defense of our western coast. We need it for the purpose of obviating the necessity of maintaining at a great expense a double line of naval vessels when with it one alone would be sufficient. We need it to save the delay in sending our vessels from one coast to the other when the loss of a day might mean the destruction of lives and property more precious and valuable than any outlay we may make in its construction. We need it, too, in times of peace as well as in times of war. The great western coast of South America should be the market for the manufactures of the East and the agricultural productions of the South and the great Mississippi Valley.

We need it for the opening trade with the countries of eastern Asia, one day destined to eclipse all the other commerce of the world. We need it in times of war for our defense and in times of peace for our commerce. Before the dawn of the twentieth century I hope and I believe that it will be under way to its completion.

But important as this great enterprise is, we are confronted with the necessity of prompt action upon another far more important from every standpoint and more urgent upon our demands for attention. That subject is the one now under discussion in this House—the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands.

CONSENSUS OF OPINION OF PUBLIC MEN.

I can hope to add nothing new to the discussion that has occupied the attention and best minds of the country for the last fifty years. The messages of our Presidents; the state papers of our Cabinet officers, our ministers, and our consuls; the professional opinions of our best military and naval experts; the careful study and expression of judgment of leading statesmen of both Houses of Congress, and the editorial utterances of the great press of the country, over the faithful reflector as well as the mold of the sentiments of the people at large, have united in one general, grand consensus of belief that it is a national duty which we owe to ourselves to annex these islands.

While it is true perhaps that there is a certain amount of sentimentality connected with this belief, arising from the fact that the progress of these islands from a state of paganism to the highest plane of Christian civilization has been due to the efforts of American missionaries; that the development of her magnificent natural resources and the upbuilding of her commerce have been the result of American immigration; that the overthrow of a corrupt and dissolute monarchy and the establishment of a constitutional republican government, modeled largely from the pattern of our own, have been wrought by American sympathizers, there is added to this a practical phase of the question which appeals not only to our self-interest but to considerations of the highest importance affecting our future welfare and protection.

Divorcing, therefore, from our consideration of this subject all questions of mere sentiment, ignoring the fact that American interests dominate and control its affairs, shutting our eyes even to the sympathy which has heretofore existed between the two countries, and which has made the Government of Hawaii during the present war assume the onerous duties and liabilities of an ally to this country instead of confining herself to the safe bounds of a neutral position, let us look at the question from the hard, practical, selfish, if you will, standpoint of the benefits which will accrue to the United States from this annexation when completed.

Naturally a question of this kind divides itself into a consideration of the positive arguments in favor of the plan and an answer to the objections which are urged against it, but these are so inseparably connected that I shall not attempt to enumerate them as distinct from each other, for the answer to each objection that is raised forms of itself a link in the chain of the argument in behalf of annexation.

STRATEGIC IMPORTANCE.

The first argument in favor of the annexation of these islands is based upon their strategic value for the defense of our Pacific coast growing out of their unique and isolated position in the midst of the great Pacific Ocean and the limitations upon the effectiveness of the modern vessels of war by reason of the absolute necessity of either carrying immense supplies of fuel or of having coaling stations at convenient intervals.

Mahan, in his article in the Forum of March, 1898, says:

The military or strategic value of a naval position depends upon its situation, upon its strength, and upon its resources. Of the three, the first is of most consequence, because it results from the nature of things, whereas the two latter, when deficient, can be artificially supplied in whole or in part. Fortifications remedy the weakness of a position, foresight accumulates beforehand the resources which nature does not yield on the spot; but it is not within the power of man to change the geographical situation of a point which lies outside the limit of strategic effect.

Let us examine from this standpoint the unique position of these islands. They stand at the center of a circle within a few hundred miles of whose circumference may be found the most important points on the western coast of the United States, the southern shores of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands, the eastern coast of Japan and the Polynesian Archipelago. Within easy steaming distance of the coaling stations of European powers in these eastern waters, no other nation on earth would hesitate to acquire possession of them were the opportunity given as it is to the United States. The following table will show their distance from these most important points:

Hawaii to—	Miles.
San Francisco.....	2,080
Nicaragua Canal.....	4,210
Tahiti.....	2,389
Papeete, Samoa.....	2,263
Auckland, New Zealand.....	3,850
Fiji.....	2,736
Marshall Islands.....	2,098
Caroline Islands.....	2,002
Hongkong.....	4,917
Yokohama, Japan.....	3,309
Unalaska, Aleutian Islands.....	2,016
Sitka.....	3,395
Vancouver.....	2,305

The location of these islands with respect to the nearest coaling stations of other nations is very concisely but comprehensively stated in the remarks of Mr. Draper, of Massachusetts, in this House in February, 1894, from which I make the following quotation:

Until 1896 Hawaii was nearer to the territory of the United States than to that of any other power, the distance to San Francisco being but 2,100 miles, while the British fortified port of Victoria, with its neighboring dockyard of Esquimalt and coal mines of Nanaimo, was 2,380 miles distant. The next nearest British port was Leontika, in Fiji group, 2,700 miles distant in an opposite direction.

French territory was 2,380 miles distant at Tahiti; Germany held the Admiralty Islands, distant 3,400 miles; and Spain the Caroline Islands, 2,900 miles distant, and the Ladroneas, about 2,900 miles distant.

Since that time Germany has moved up to a distance of 2,006 miles by annexing the Marshall Islands and placing herself in a flanking position on both the South Pacific and trans-Pacific trade routes.

France, by the acquisition of the Low Archipelago and the Marquesas Islands, is 2,050 miles distant from Hawaii, on the South Pacific route. Great Britain has advanced from Fiji toward the intersecting point on clearly defined lines, annexing group after group and detached islands when they were in the line of approach, even though uninhabited or without harbors or commercial value, until in 1891 her flag was planted on Johnston Island, 600 miles from Hawaii and the nearest point she can approach to her American territory, unless the next move be the occupation of Hawaii itself.

Hon. Lorin Thurston says:

In the Pacific Ocean from the Equator to Alaska, from the coasts of China and Japan to the American Continent, there is but one spot where a ton of coal, a pound of bread, or a gallon of water can be obtained by a passing vessel, and that spot is Hawaii.

In the necessities of modern naval warfare, the architect is confronted by the three serious problems of formidable armament, invulnerable armor, and coal-carrying capacity, and the nice adjustment of these three elements in such a way as to procure, at the same time, the greatest speed is the one problem which is engaging the attention of naval experts throughout the world. Any one of these three features abnormally developed at the expense of the others impairs the efficiency of the fighting machine.

A battle ship or cruiser with large storage capacity for coal can carry proportionately fewer guns of lighter caliber and with armament more liable to penetration by the modern projectile. So that while she might obtain the advantage of remaining long at sea without recoaling, she would at the same time be at a serious disadvantage in conflict with a vessel carrying heavier armor and throwing a greater weight of projectile to a greater distance. On the other hand, it matters not how impervious her armor or deadly her armament, if she can not carry within herself her means of locomotion, she becomes worthless except for purposes of coast defense.

"A modern battle ship without coal is like a caged lion—magnificent, but harmless."

So unanimous are modern strategists upon the importance of Hawaii as a strategic point that it has been aptly named and universally referred to as "the key of the Pacific." Its importance to the United States as a means of protection to our western coast has attracted the attention of this Government for many years. General Schofield, who visited the islands under the instructions of the Secretary of War in 1872, said:

The Hawaiian Islands constitute the only natural outpost to the defenses of the Pacific coast. In possession of a foreign naval power in time of war, as a depot from which to fit out hostile expeditions against this coast and our commerce on the Pacific Ocean, they would afford the means of incalculable injury to the United States. If the absolute neutrality of the islands could always be insured, that would suffice; but they have not and never could have the power to maintain their own neutrality, and now their necessities force them to seek alliance with some nation which can relieve their embarrassment. The British Empire stands ready to enter into such an alliance, and thus complete its chain of naval stations from Australia to British Columbia. We can not refuse the islands the little aid they need and at the same time deny their right to seek it elsewhere. The time has come when we must secure forever the desired control over these islands or let it pass into other hands. The financial interest to the United States involved in this treaty is very small, and if it were much greater it would still be insignificant when compared to the importance of such a military and naval station to the national security and welfare.

Quoting again from Captain Mahan:

Shut out from the Sandwich Islands as a coal base, an enemy is thrown back for supplies of fuel to distances of 3,500 or 4,000 miles—or between 7,000 and 8,000 going and coming—an impediment to sustained maritime operations well-nigh prohibitive. The coal mines of British Columbia constitute, of course, a qualification to this statement; but upon them, if need arose, we might at least hope to impose some trammels by action from the land side. It is rarely that so important a factor in the attack or defense of a coast line—a sea frontier—is concentrated in a single position, and the circumstance renders doubly imperative upon us to secure it if we righteously can.

Admiral Bellknap reinforces these opinions in the following language:

A glance at a chart of the Pacific will indicate to the most casual observer the great importance and inestimable value of these islands as a strategic point and commercial center. * * * Not to take the fruit within our grasp and annex the group now begging us to take it in would be folly indeed—a mistake of a gravest character, both for the statesmen of the day and for the men among us of high commercial aims and great enterprises.

OUR PRESENT NEED OF THE ISLANDS.

But we need not depend upon the theoretical considerations which evolve the opinions of these distinguished experts. We are having to-day a practical illustration of the absolute necessity of these islands to the United States in the conduct of the war we are waging against Spain. Not a vessel that we are sending to Dewey's relief could reach him, not a battalion of the troops which are being carried on transports to complete the subjugation of Manila could be landed at that port, if we were deprived of the privilege of obtaining fresh supplies at this great halfway port in the long journey cross the broad expanse of the Pacific. It is not sufficient to say that when the war with Spain is ended there will be little occasion for offensive operations by American fleets and armies in the waters of eastern Asia.

Little did we imagine before the present war that we should find it necessary to carry offensive operations to so remote a point as the Philippines, and it will not do for us to blindly shut our eyes to the possibility of just such future contingencies again arising. We have learned the lesson that in a war with a foreign power we must be prepared for offensive as well as defensive action, and with every European nation stretching out for bases of supply from which their fleets may operate, and already forming a cordon of advanced posts drawing nearer year by year to our Pacific coast, we shall soon be hemmed in on the west as we are now upon the east and south. With Hawaii in our possession we shall be reasonably secure. Without it, and especially in the hands of an unfriendly nation, we have a menace continually threatening us.

I shall not comment upon the importance of these islands to us from a commercial standpoint, although their accession to our control would mean a vast increase in profitable commerce by the investment of American capital and a rapid growth of our merchant marine for handling the trade of these islands. These mere pecuniary and commercial considerations are so far overshadowed by their importance to us for offensive and defensive purposes that they may be left out of consideration.

SOME OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

And now let us see what are some of the objections to and arguments against the union that is proposed.

The first, and what would be the most serious one if it were tenable, is the claim that such action would be contrary to our own Constitution.

This claim of unconstitutionality proceeds upon the theory that because there is not a distinct grant of power to annex territory, or because the territory is not contiguous, or because the character of its people is not similar to those of the territory now occupied by the United States, we have not the power to act.

ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY ALREADY MADE.

Fortunately these questions are not new and have all been settled by the highest authorities known to our system of government. While it may be true that the Constitution does not, in so many words, refer to our right to annex additional territory, as a matter of fact we commenced such annexation in the very infancy of our Republic and have continued in that policy down to the present time. We have annexed by purchase, we have annexed by treaty, and we have annexed practically by conquest, or by treaty as a result of conquest. We purchased Louisiana in 1803; Florida in 1819; California, New Mexico, and Arizona, in 1849, came to us as a result of the Mexican war; we annexed Texas by joint resolution of Congress in 1844, and bought Alaska from Russia in 1867. We have occupied and practically annexed the Midway Island in the North Pacific, even farther from our coast than the Hawaiian Islands, and the right to make these annexations has been passed upon by the highest constitutional authority in existence, the Supreme Court of the United States.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ANNEXATION.

Chief Justice Marshall, in 1 Peters, 542, said:

The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the power of making wars and making treaties. Consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or treaty.

And this doctrine has been even more recently reaffirmed by the same court in the following words:

The power to acquire territory is derived from the treaty-making power, and the power to declare and carry on war.

The incidents of these powers are those of national sovereignty, and belong to all independent governments.

So much, then, for the objection that because the Constitution does not contain a specific grant of power we have no authority; for we see that this power to annex is a necessary consequence of our existence as a sovereign and independent nation. These decisions would seem to be broad enough to cover equally the other two constitutional objections, even if they were strictly new questions. But here again we have precedents, upon which no questions have been raised, to establish our rights. The objection that Hawaii is not contiguous becomes of little importance when we recall that the greater portion of the magnificent domain of Alaska is more remote from the nearest point of the rest of our United States territory than is Hawaii and that we are separated from the former by the domain of a foreign government as well as by an equal stretch of ocean, and that the Midway Island and the Aleutian Islands are absolutely detached from contiguous territory. This objection, therefore, fails.

CHARACTER OF INHABITANTS.

That the inhabitants of Hawaii, or at least a majority of them, are of different race and civilization from those of the United States is undoubtedly true; but did not the same objection lie to the inhabitant of all the territory which we have annexed from the beginning? At the time of the Louisiana purchase the Indians far exceeded in number the white inhabitants, and the latter were largely made up of men alien to our civilization, laws, and customs. Alaska contained nothing but a few Indian tribes, Esquimos, and Russian traders. In comparison with these the population of Hawaii would be far more desirable, for they have had the benefit of Christian education and the enlightening influences of commercial intercourse with civilized nations.

The fear that we would not assimilate this population deserves but little consideration in the face of our experience with the immigration from foreign countries and the rapidity with which within one or two generations at the most they become homogeneous with our other citizens. Once in our possession, too, suitable restrictions can be thrown around the further settlement of these islands by the undesirable class of Asiatics who have within the last few years threatened to overwhelm with their numbers the white population.

All other objections to the annexation of these islands seem to be based rather upon the question of the wisdom of the policy than upon the power to annex. One of the most frequently urged objections on this score is that its remoteness from the continental portion of the United States would render it an object of special attack by hostile nations and would entail upon us the necessity of keeping up a much greater navy and of entailing much heavier expenditures in order to protect it in time of war. Neither of these positions is, in the judgment of those best qualified to speak, tenable.

WILL SAVE EXPENSE OF KEEPING UP LARGE NAVY IN THE PACIFIC.

With Pearl Harbor, the only inlet upon any of the islands capable of receiving and protecting a fleet of large war vessels, well defended, and Honolulu, a few miles distant, properly fortified by American soldiers drawn from the Hawaiian residents, a mere handful of men and one or two battle ships or monitors could protect the island against any hostile fleet that might be sent against it. An attack, if made and unsuccessful, would almost necessarily mean the loss of the attacking fleet, for no vessels that could be sent from any other coal-supply station could run to Hawaii, remain any considerable time to make an attack, and then return to the station which it had left. Its coal bunkers would, long before its arrival, be exhausted, and it would be helpless and defenseless against not only a hostile fleet but even the elements themselves.

As to the fear that it would require a greater Navy and entail greater expense to this Government, it would seem to be reasonable that if by maintaining two or three modern vessels of war at the Hawaiian Islands we can absolutely prevent the approach of hostile fleets from eastern Asia, it would be far less expensive than maintaining a large number of vessels at each of our unprotected points upon the Pacific coast. An ounce of prevention would, in this case, be far better than a pound of cure. Especially does this argument become convincing should the Nicaraguan Canal be constructed and controlled by the United States, for then our vessels in the Atlantic fleet could reinforce our squadron in the Pacific before the vessels of a hostile power could reach Hawaii from any except the nearest outlying station.

It is the opinion of those best qualified to judge that its annexation will obviate the necessity for large expenditures rather than cause them. We have to take care of Hawaii in the sense of not allowing any other nation to occupy it. This doctrine we have affirmed and reaffirmed on many occasions, and it is now recognized and conceded by every nation on earth that we have that right. It is sufficiently within the sphere of the American influence to bring it strictly within the provisions of the Monroe doctrine, and on more than one occasion that doctrine has been invoked to prevent the occupation of those islands by other powers.

If, therefore, we have this responsibility cast upon us, and remembering that in carrying it out we may become involved at almost any time with another nation who finds it necessary to take military possession of them, how much wiser, easier, and less expensive it would be to us were we to exercise this control not as a mere protectorate over a little helpless nation, but as a part of our own independent and sovereign territory.

RIGHT OF HAWAIIAN GOVERNMENT TO ACT.

As to arguments which are raised against the project for reasons growing out of the fact that the governing element of the island constitutes but a mere minority of the entire population, that a large number of its people are denied the right of suffrage, and that any proposition to annex should be submitted to a vote of the entire people instead of the Government now in existence, it is sufficient to say that none of these things have been regarded as of any importance in other cases in which we have acquired territory. With the exception of Texas, the consent of these people was neither asked nor received.

The negotiations were conducted with the sovereign authorities controlling the territory. Even in the case of Texas the people themselves did not pass upon the question directly. It is sufficient for us to know, therefore, that there is a stable Government in these islands, which, acting under constitutional provision specifically set forth, has the right to propose and consummate this annexation. This Government has been recognized by every civilized nation not only as de facto but de jure. It has all the powers of sovereignty, including that of joining the island by cession to a foreign power. This has been universally recognized as a result of conquest and as preliminary to the sale or cession of territory by peaceful means. We are not hampered, therefore, by any question of the power of the Government with which we will deal.

SUMMARY.

The whole situation, therefore, seems to resolve itself into this: There is no constitutional prohibition, but, on the contrary, ample power; as to the policy which should control the Government, there is no division of sentiment among those who have considered it from the standpoint of strategic necessity; as to its value for commercial purposes, the whole course of our official action, including the negotiation of treaties of commerce and reciprocity, bears evidence. We would need it at the present time as a military necessity, but even in times of peace we shall need it as a resting place for the fleet we shall have to keep in eastern waters and the relief and assistance which our peaceful commerce will need in its long passage across the Pacific.

It comes to us without war, without bloodshed, without a foreign complication, a voluntary donation of its own Government, its own freewill offering. It is asked for by the Administration as a necessity, and I am ready to grant the request.

For my part, I do not fear that we shall depart from the traditional policy of our country of noninterference in the affairs of foreign nations, but I do believe that the surest safeguard against the interference of foreign governments in our affairs will be the enlargement of our naval armament, the procurement of stations scattered at suitable intervals as harbors of refuge and supply, the building of the Nicaraguan Canal, the retention of Puerto Rico as a guard to its entrance, and the annexation of Hawaii as the "Key of the Pacific." [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] such time as he may desire.

[Mr. ERMENTROUT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to this country because, upon the whole, it appears to me that the project would bring more burdens than benefits. It probably would bring some benefits, for it is hard to conceive of a scheme so wild that has not some compensatory features. But, sir, in a matter of such grave importance as this, involving, as it does, a radical change of our historical policy, it ought not to receive our sanction unless it is clear, considering its future as well as its present effects, that there is a decided preponderance of advantage in it, and every doubt should be resolved against the proposition.

We should accept nothing by faith alone in a matter of such transcendent importance. It is claimed that the people of this country, almost as a unit, are in favor of the proposition. That assertion I deny; the masses of the people have given the subject very little thought, but almost every expression from the farmers and wage earners has been against it. It is true, there appears to be considerable sentiment in its favor, judging from public prints and utterances, but even that is largely sentiment, that has not ripened into conviction. It has been well said that one noisy man will make more noise than forty quiet ones; and that aphorism is peculiarly true of the situation respecting the question of annexation.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL ASPECT.

In the first place, the resolutions ought to be defeated because it is an attempt to accomplish by the legislative department of the Government that which the organic law clearly requires to be done by the Executive. Without entering upon an analysis of the Federal Constitution, I desire to advert to the fact that each department of the Government is and must be independent of the others, and it would be dangerous and revolutionary for one department to arrogate functions and powers vested by the Constitution in the others. Under the division of powers the President has absolutely no legislative authority except the qualified negative in the form of the veto. Every member of this House will admit not only that the President has constitutional authority to negotiate for the annexation of territory, subject to the approval of the Senate, but that his is the only proper agency to accomplish that end, because it involves the exercise of the treaty-making power exclusively vested in the President by the Constitution.

The question is purely an executive one, without a single legislative feature. There is no express authority in the Federal Constitution for the acquisition of territory, and in the early history of the Republic the existence of that authority was denied by many able statesmen. But the always convenient doctrine of inherent power was conceived, and now no one questions the authority of the people through their constitutional agencies to enlarge the public domain by the annexation of additional territory. But every lawyer must admit that negotiations for the annexation of outlying territory are executive in character, regardless of the form in which they are placed. The legislative formula, "Be it resolved, etc.," can not change a proposition essentially executive in its character to one of a legislative nature.

This body has no executive powers whatever, excepting such as are incident to its own organization and government. Negotiations for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands were first entered upon by the President in the form of a treaty with those assuming to act for the islands, containing the same provisions as the pending resolutions; but the treaty required the assent of two-thirds of the Senators, and it became apparent that it could not command that assent, so it has been abandoned and this expedient invented to evade the limitations of the Constitution. The simplest treaty with a foreign country must be ratified by two-thirds of the Senators, but it is gravely claimed that a treaty of annexation affecting the destiny of the whole nation may be sanctioned by a bare majority of the Senators.

Any measure that fails to receive the sanction of the people, through their constitutional organism, ought to be defeated in an attempt to subvert the Constitution, whatever may be its merits. The preservation of the constitutional limitations and guaranties is of infinitely greater importance than the acquisition of new territory, however desirable. No end will justify means of such a revolutionary character. But it is claimed that a precedent exists for the proposed action in the acquisition of Texas. It is true that Texas was admitted into the Union by a joint resolution of Congress, after a treaty for its annexation had failed to be ratified by the Senate, but it was admitted as a State and not as a Territory.

Section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, confers upon Congress the power to admit new States into the Union, and it was insisted that as Texas was to be admitted into the Union as a State and not annexed as a Territory it could be done by joint resolution. That doctrine was combated by the ablest lawyers and statesmen of the time, on the ground that the power to admit States into the Union embraced only States created out of territory already a part of the national domain. Congress took the other view, however, and Texas was admitted into the Union as a State by joint resolution, and the action was acquiesced in by the people. But never in the history of the country has territory been admitted as such by joint resolution or by Congressional action.

Florida, Louisiana, and Alaska were annexed by treaty, and California by conquest. The attempts to annex St. Thomas and the Dominican Republic were by treaty, and not by joint resolution. Upon the failure of the treaty to annex San Domingo President Grant suggested that it be done by Congressional action, but the power to so acquire it was quite generally denied. Senator Thurman, of Ohio, one of the ablest lawyers of the country, in discussing the question, said:

You can not by joint resolution annex San Domingo as a Territory; you must annex her as a State if you annex her by joint resolution. There is no clause in the Constitution that provides for the acquisition of territory by joint resolution, unless it be that Congress may admit new States into the Union. It was upon the argument that there was no limitation upon that power to admit new States into the Union; that it was not limited to territory belonging to the United States, but that territory belonging to a foreign power might be admitted into the Union as a State. It was upon that doctrine that the resolution in the case of Texas was passed. But no one has ever pretended that you could by joint resolution annex territory as a Territory without admitting it as a State.

The history of this country affords no precedent for the annexation of territory as such by joint resolution of Congress, and any such attempt is clearly repugnant to the Constitution.

The Federal Supreme Court has repeatedly affirmed the views of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Insurance Company v. Canter (1 Peters, 542), that the constitutional methods of acquiring additional territory are by treaty and conquest. Will anyone contend that this body has any share in the treaty-making power? I assert, as a proposition of law, that the House of Representatives and the President possess no concurrent powers. If the pending proposition is legislative in its character the President had no authority to negotiate the treaty in the first place, and if it is executive this body has no constitutional authority over it whatever. It is altogether probable that if the resolutions shall pass both branches of Congress and receive Executive approval no one will ever question our title to the islands, but the habit of inventing subterfuge to evade the plain provisions of the Constitution is dangerous and destructive in its tendencies.

Suppose the President should disagree to the resolutions and should veto them and they should subsequently pass both branches of Congress by a two-thirds vote, notwithstanding the veto, would it be claimed that annexation so attempted would have any constitutional sanction? I apprehend not. The courts have no authority to review the exercise of political powers, and for this reason greater caution should characterize the action of the Government, because of the danger of overriding established limitations by insidious encroachment.

CLIMATIC CONDITIONS.

I am opposed to the project because it will incorporate into our political system territory over 2,000 miles from our coast, under a blazing, tropical sun—territory that can contribute but little to the greatness of the Republic and will necessarily detract from the high standard of its citizenship. The dignity of labor is the glory of our civilization, and its standard can never be lowered without material injury to the general welfare. White labor never has gone into tropical countries and it never will go there. It is proposed to annex territory capable of supporting a million people, in which all labor must be performed by people of a very low order of civil and industrial life, and bring them into direct competition with the high-class, intelligent labor of the States.

That policy, sir, has been repeatedly repudiated by the people of this country at the polls. The protection of American labor from competition with the cheap labor of other countries has been a cardinal doctrine of the Republican party ever since its organization. The ingenuity of our statesmanship is now being taxed to invent methods of removing convict labor from competition with free labor, and yet it is asserted that it will not degrade the intelligent labor of America to put it into direct competition with ill-paid sea-island, Japanese, and Chinese workmen. That competition can not be avoided if annexation shall be accomplished. Unity of interest, sentiment, and destiny, so far as it can be attained, is highly necessary to the happiness of our people and the perpetuity of Republican institutions, and we are already so diversified that perplexing and dangerous political and economical problems confront us, demanding solution.

The difference in the degree of development in various parts of the country are so marked that ugly antagonisms exist and popular discontent is fomented. Measures adapted to one section are unsuited to the demands of another, and legislation, general in its scope, must be so compromised to secure something near equality of operation, that its efficiency is in a large degree impaired. These discordant elements constitute the gravest danger with which we have to contend, whether domestic or foreign. Gentlemen contend that laws may be made for the government of colonial acquisitions, adapted to the degree of civil development, and that we need not admit the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands into full political partnership with us until it is deemed expedient.

The principle that all citizens are equal before the law is the bed-rock of Republican institutions, and a policy that will discriminate between citizens is repugnant to the genius of free government. Equality is the soul of the Republic, and it is the beginning of the end when this great country can find excuses to make invidious distinctions between its own citizens. Besides this, there is no place in our political system for permanent colonial governments. The Constitution contemplates that every foot of territory within our dominion, outside of the District of Columbia, shall ultimately form part of a State with a citizenship equal to that of all the States. The Federal Supreme Court, in the famous Dred Scott decision, declared that—

There is no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish and maintain colonies bordering on the United States, nor at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits, except by the admission of new States: . . . The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given; and in the construction of this power by all the Departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory, not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority.

What becomes of the policy advanced by annexationists that the Government can permanently control the islands by a system fitted to their situation, capacity, and development? It is not the policy of the Government to admit any class of people into the political household that can not intelligently and helpfully participate in free government and profit by its privileges. I confess that I have some sentiment upon the question of citizenship. I love to look upon my fellow-citizen with the consciousness that, however humble his station in life, he is the equal before the law of the greatest in the land, and that from his loins may spring a posterity that will bless humanity and glorify republican institutions. A race that does not possess these splendid possibilities must lower the dignity of our citizenship.

The marvelous growth and uneven development of the country are largely responsible for present conditions, and many of our most troublesome questions will be removed by time. Our interests will be more equitably adjusted and grow into more harmonious relations with further development. The standard of life in all parts of the country must be measured according to a common scale, and we have now as great a diversification of climate, resource, and tendency as can be successfully trained together under one political organization. The Temperate Zone, by inexorable law, has always contained, and always will contain, the highest intelligence of the world and all that is most helpful in civilized life. The tropical climate stifles growth and impedes progress in the individual, and, of course, in society, for the individual is the social unit. Our exigencies should be pressing indeed to justify the incorporation into our social system of territory which, from its unalterable conditions, can not keep pace with us in our march to a higher destiny.

The situation certainly does not justify that radical departure at this time, and I sincerely hope it never will. The islands are as widely separated from us socially and industrially as they are physically. There is not a single tendency or interest in common between us, and our destinies are unalterably divergent. The people of the islands are incapable of self-government, and always will be. No progressive republic can ever endure in the torrid zone. The infusion of that exotic into our national currents will tend to corrupt our whole system; it will be a festering sore in the body politic, to irritate and annoy for all time. A pressing necessity is recognized for the exclusion from our domain of immigrants whose influence upon our institutions would be deleterious, and yet it is proposed to introduce at one coup a whole race of people so stolid and unresponsive in their very natures that they can not be assimilated by our civilizing forces.

The suggestion that the Mongolians shall be excluded from the islands when they shall have passed under our control is no remedy, for the natives are equally objectionable, and no desirable people can become inured to that environment. The climate and soil preclude the hope of a high civilization, and if the islands should be stocked with the best Anglo-Saxon blood they would degenerate into a race of indolents in a few generations, under the influence of the enervating surroundings. He who declares to the contrary disputes an immutable law of individual development and goes into the face of all history and experience.

Do we want a country incapable of keeping step with us to the inspiring music of progress, a country that will operate as a check, a drawback, to our forward movement? Insular possessions so far away from the continent would add to the causes for international complications and embarrassments and become a luxuriant soil for the growth of political speculation and scandal.

THE COMMERCE OF THE ISLANDS.

Much has been said about the importance to us of the trade of the islands. Those who have given the matter careful consideration for years past must know that their trade has been an expensive luxury. It is unquestionably true that the islands produce staple articles of commerce similar to those produced by other tropical countries, but they do not contribute a single article to the world's trade the like of which can not be gotten elsewhere. The surroundings and habits of living of the inhabitants are such that they require comparatively few of the products of this country. Their trade naturally belongs to us to the extent that it is mutually beneficial, and their geographical situation guarantees us almost absolute control of it without annexation or treaty concessions.

It is not necessary to admit them to our political freinds in order to obtain that which we can have without. It would be dearly purchased, indeed, if we were compelled to do that. Their commerce was insignificant prior to the treaty with this country, in 1875, admitting their products into our ports free of duty. Their chief article of export is sugar, and the concessions extended by the treaty gave a powerful impulse to sugar growing on the islands. The attention of American investors had been attracted to the situation and private corporations were organized to control the sugar plantations. Substantially all the sugar plantations of the island are now in the hands of those corporations and over 75 per cent of the stock is owned by American investors.

It was the influence of those stockholders that procured the treaty. With the enormous advantage secured by the treaty over other sugar-producing countries, the corporate influences induced the Hawaiian Government to negotiate treaties with Japan, China, and other countries to enable the planters to import laborers under the contract system, that they might have cheap labor to cultivate the plantations. Thousands of Japanese and Chinese laborers were brought to the islands under those treaties, and they now constitute the chief industrial force of the country.

With the coolie system of labor and a rebate of duties by this country, the profits of the sugar barons were enormous. The planters have sold substantially the entire product to the sugar refiners' trust in this country, delivered at San Francisco, at a price one-fourth of a cent a pound below the current New York price. The rebate of duty did not cheapen sugar to the consumers in this country, but it was a clear bonus to the sugar planters' trust of Hawaii and the refiners' trust in America. Our trade with the islands last year amounted to $18,377,000. We purchased from them $13,687,000 of products, mostly sugar, and sold them goods to the amount of $4,690,000. We paid them about $9,000,000 more than we received from them, and in addition, the rebate of duties we gave them for the privilege of purchasing their sugar at the same rate we could have gotten it from other countries amounted to $5,354,512.80.

What did the people of this country receive for this enormous concession? Not a farthing, outside of the sugar trust. We gave more in the way of rebate by over $600,000 than our entire sales to them amounted to. In other words, we paid the people of those islands full market price for their sugar, the same as if no rebate had been granted. We gave them $4,890,000 of our products and $600,000 in cash in addition! That is called a commercial reciprocity treaty! The reciprocity feature is a fiction. If the sugar planters and refiners had sufficient influence to bring about that treaty and the treaties between Hawaii and Japan and China respecting contract labor in 1875, if they had the two Governments by the throat then, why have they not power enough to accomplish political union between them in 1898?

IS THE SUGAR TRUST AGAINST ANNEXATION?

Why, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen tell us that the American sugar trust is opposing annexation, and therefore we ought to establish it. Questions of this magnitude ought to be settled by reason, and not by prejudice. It is not very complimentary to the statesmanship of this body to attempt to influence its action by considerations of that kind. But what is the truth respecting the attitude of the sugar trust toward the scheme? Agents of that institution are men of adroitness, and they know well enough that if they openly espoused a measure it would have to be exceptionally meritorious to muster votes enough to prevail. They fully appreciate the intensity of the prejudice against that organization, and if they desire a proposition to succeed they can not help it more than by ostensibly opposing it.

But where do the interests of that organization lie? For where its treasures are, there will its heart be also. The sugar refiners' trust receives directly about one-fourth of the bonus granted by the Government to the Hawaiian sugar, and it is known that officers of the trust are large stockholders in the sugar-producing corporations on the islands. The bonus has averaged over $3,000,000 a year since the date of the treaty, and has aggregated the enormous sum of $65,000,000. A sum more than sufficient to buy every foot of land in the islands taken from the pockets of the people of this country without any compensatory return! The treaty is liable to be abrogated at any time and this immense source of revenue cut off. It is the umbilical cord through which the sugar-growing barons and the refiners' trust have been absorbing nourishment, and they can not afford to have it severed.

Annexation would secure free markets in this country and all the benefits enjoyed under the treaty, and in addition it would secure stability of government on the islands. Without going into the ethical questions involved in the proposition to annex, it must be admitted that the existing government is not deeply rooted in the affections of the people and a revolt is liable to occur at any time. By annexation they would secure open markets and a stable government, two factors highly essential to the sugar interests. The commerce of the islands has been largely developed under the impetus of the treaty and depends for its maintenance upon the extension of the treaty or annexation. Our trade with any foreign country might be vastly increased by similar one-sided concessions, but we would soon grow poor under that kind of traffic.

But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen assure us that annexation would put an end to the contract-labor system on the islands. Would it? Let us examine that question briefly. In the first place, if it did, the planters could afford to pay twice as high a rate of wages as they are paying under the present system, and then have an annual bonus over legitimate profits of $2,000,000. But American labor never will cultivate the sugar plantations on those islands, and unless Mongolians and South Sea Islanders are employed they will go uncultivated. White labor will never contest with the half-civilized hordes of the Orient and the Pacific islands for industrial supremacy in that field, and natives and coolies must do the work. They are immune; it is their element; and the cheap-labor system can never be terminated without materially impairing production. The sugar barons and refiners know this, and they know that production will not be stopped.

This is foreshadowed in President McKinley's message submitting the annexation treaty to the Senate in these words:

What the conditions of such a union shall be, the political relation thereof to the United States, the character of the local administration, the quality and degree of the elective franchise of the inhabitants, the extension of the Federal laws to the territory, or the enactment of special laws to fit the peculiar condition thereof, the regulation, if need be, of the labor system therein, are all matters which the treaty has wisely relegated to Congress.

The labor system will be regulated to meet the peculiar conditions on the islands. That is, the coolie system will be permitted, because of the inability to procure other labor. The sugar barons know what that means. They know what regulation of the labor system and laws of the United States is required by the "peculiar condition." By annexation they would secure everything to be desired, and with their monopoly of the interest they would go on accumulating millions upon millions at the expense of the citizens of this country. I firmly believe that much of the annexation sentiment is inspired by the sugar barons on the islands and the sugar refiners of this country. I am convinced that if the treaty had to run for a quarter of a century yet the Hawaiian authorities would not have proposed annexation.

Last year there were 25,782 laborers employed on the sugar plantations, and only 1,617 of them were natives. There were 12,823 Japanese, 6,289 Chinese, 2,268 Portuguese, and 715 of other nationalities, nearly all under the contract system, and not an American amongst them. Great solicitude is expressed by gentlemen for the high-minded Americans who are said to have gone to the islands to carry with them the beauties of American civilization. We are told that they have rescued the islands from heathenism and educated and Christianized the natives. There doubtless have gone to that benighted people many worthy representatives of our Christian civilization; but of those who are there actively urging the scheme of annexation we know they have gotten substantially all the productive resources in their clutches; they have monopolized the Government; they have overrun the natives with sun-worshippers from the South Sea Islands and pagan coolies from China and Japan, that they might grow rich from their cheap sweat and toil.

These high-minded gentlemen have overturned established institutions and fixed upon the people an industrial system hardly a degree above absolute slavery. They are entitled to sympathy and encouragement indeed! The Saviour stigmatized better men as thieves and robbers and scourged them out of the Temple. Are we, Mr. Speaker, to be made the tools of these designing mercenaries and loan the great forces of our Government to enable them to further prey upon helplessness?

What possible interest has the American Sugar Trust in defeating the scheme of annexation? Hawaiian sugar has come to our markets free of duty for twenty-five years, and annexation would only make the arrangement permanent. That sugar comes here in a raw state, and the trust does all the refining. The Hawaiian Sugar Trust is behind the whole scheme, and it is prolific of resources. Under the tariff law of 1890 duties were removed from sugar, and Hawaii had no advantage in our markets over other sugar-growing countries. A bounty was paid to American sugar growers, and the Hawaiian barons had the audacity to set forces in motion with the view of effecting annexation so they could share in the bounty. Local disturbances were created, and the revolution of 1893 occurred and was made the pretext for immediate tender of dominion to this country. There is scarcely a doubt that that revolution was encouraged by the sugar planters for the purpose of effecting political union with this country and securing a bounty on their sugar product. In 1889 Mr. Merrill, who was our minister to the Hawaiian Government, wrote:

It is noticeable that among the American residents in Hawaii there are several who, from personal motives, contemplate with satisfaction periodical disquietude in the Kingdom, hoping that frequent revolutionary epochs will force the United States Government to make these islands a part of its territory. * * * In order to keep affairs in as much turmoil as possible, baseless rumors are constantly put in circulation, many of which find publication in other countries.

Under the terms of the treaty of annexation negotiated by President Harrison the Hawaiian planters were assured the benefits of our bounty law. Minister Stevens, under date of February 1, 1893, wrote Secretary of State Foster:

As to terms of "annexation," I still adhere firmly to the opinion that the sugar bounty to be paid to the Hawaiian planters should be limited to 6 mills per pound—$12 per ton.

A bounty of $12 a ton on an output of 250,000 tons a year, paid by the people of this country to the Hawaiian sugar barons! Three millions of dollars a year from American sweat and toil! Is it any wonder the oligarchy was keen to surrender the sovereignty of the islands to this country? They were willing to sell the birthright of the inoffensive natives, which they had gotten by artifice, for three millions a year of American gold. As far back as 1873 the same schemers were at work attempting to secure free markets in this country. They were willing to surrender the most sacred rights of the people for gain. General Schofield, who is so frequently quoted by the friends of annexation, wrote from the islands in 1873 these words:

The great object of the Hawaiian Government in seeking a reciprocity treaty with the United States has been, and will probably continue to be, to relieve the sugar planters from the operation of our tariff on their sugar. * * * Indeed, the sugar planters are so anxious for a reciprocity treaty, or so anxious, rather, for "free trade" in sugar with the United States, that many of them openly proclaim themselves in favor of "annexation" of these islands to the United States.

That, Mr. Speaker, clearly exposes the motives and methods of the Hawaiian oligarchy in seeking annexation. Greed is their motive, and disingenuousness their method. I deplore the existence of the American Sugar Trust, but as between it and the Hawaiian trust my sympathies are with the American, for it does employ intelligent labor and contributes somewhat to the support of free institutions, while, on the other hand, the Hawaiian trust employs none but cheap Asiatic labor and contributes to the maintenance of the coolie industrial system.

Hawaii is the paradise of commercial jobbers; it is the worst trust-ridden country of the hemisphere; its commerce, its production, its politics, and its conscience are all controlled by corporations. Do we need it? Is there a necessity for any more trusts in our country? We are asked to assume the Hawaiian public debt, amounting to $4,000,000, and remit taxes amounting to over $6,000,000 a year for all time. Can we afford to pay that immense price for the slight benefit we would derive from control of the islands? And that is only the beginning, for there will be forts, fortifications, ocean cables, mail contracts, warships, enlarged armies and navies, and the Lord only knows what all!

THE SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY.

A new impulse has been given to beet-sugar production in this country by the existing tariff law, and it is confidently hoped that in the near future American farmers will grow all of the sugar required for our consumption. Our farmers can never compete with Hawaiian sugar growers, with their advantages of climate and coolie labor, and the effect will be either to retard beet-sugar production here or continue to put enormous profits in the coffers of the Hawaiian sugar barons at the expense of American consumers. We can afford neither. These islands produce annually about 250,000 tons of sugar—over one-sixth of our entire importation. The farmers and wage earners of this country, who constitute the power and glory of our civilization, stand as a unit against annexation.

The question for us to decide is, Will we legislate in favor of the millions of farmers and laborers of America, who support our institutions, or in favor of the sugar barons of the Hawaiian Islands, who have been preying upon our substance like commercial cormorants for the last quarter of a century? I am for the farmers and laborers of this country.

THE STRATEGICAL QUESTION.

The principal argument in support of annexation is that the islands are so located that they would constitute a valuable naval outpost and would be especially dangerous to our Pacific coast in the hands of a hostile power.

They are declared to be the key to the Pacific Ocean, and we are told that if we do not annex them, since they are so generously tendered to us, that we will have no right to object to their occupancy by some other country. It is the same old story that was told when we had under consideration the proposition to purchase the Island of St. Thomas of Denmark during President Johnson's Administration and the proposition to annex Santo Domingo during President Grant's Administration. They were a key to something or some place, and we needed them for strategical reasons and to develop commerce.

President Grant, the greatest military genius of the century, threw all the weight of his personal, professional, and political influence in favor of acquiring Santo Domingo, and failed. He demonstrated its necessity from a military standpoint, and the danger of allowing it to go into the hands of a foreign power. He expatiated upon its peculiar advantages in developing South American trade, and solemnly warned the country that if we failed to annex it a European power stood ready to pay $2,000,000 for Samana Bay alone, and that it would be sold. The Senate refused to ratify the treaty, and the subject was dropped altogether out of politics. Samana Bay is still there under the same control, and our sense of security has not been disturbed a particle by our failure to acquire it. Our trade with South America has continued to develop, and no one now thinks the country made a mistake in refusing to adopt the recommendations of President Grant.

The same old argument has been resurrected, galvanized over, and made to do service in support of the proposition to annex the Hawaiian Islands. It is supported by the opinions of a number of very respectable naval experts, who are fertile in theory and barren in experience, but they fail to make a better case for the pending project than that greater military expert, President Grant, made in favor of Santo Domingo twenty-five years ago. It is not an expert question, and must be settled by the application of common-sense rules and principles. The political, industrial, and economical phases of the proposition should receive attention as well as the strategical. While I have a high regard for the opinions of naval experts on expert propositions, they are more than human if their judgments are not highly colored by professional training. A long course of study of one branch of government is apt to lead to an exaggerated estimation of its relative importance.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. TAWNEY. I only wanted to ask the gentleman whether there is any relation whatever between the policy which the Government of the United States has pursued in the past with respect to the islands of Hawaii and our policy with regard to San Domingo, of which the gentleman has just been speaking.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; I think they are all within the range of the Monroe doctrine. And I will take occasion to say right here—

Mr. TAWNEY. Just one word further. Have we ever maintained the policy of not allowing other nations to interfere with San Domingo as we have done with respect to the islands of Hawaii for the last half a century?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have, most assuredly. Those islands are within the range of the Monroe doctrine; and if now we should permit the Sandwich Islands to go into the hands of a foreign power we should still be infinitely safer on the Pacific coast, according to the opinion of all naval and military experts, than we are on the Atlantic; and everybody in the country knows that we are in no danger whatever on the Atlantic coast. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Wait till we get into war with a country that has a navy, and you will find out whether our Atlantic coast is in danger.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The countries that have great navies are so weakened in their domestic situation that they do not dare to go to war. They have jealousies at home. Spain has none, because she is too small and inconsequential.

There are numerous islands in much closer proximity to our eastern coast than the Hawaiians are to the western, and we do not own a single one of them; they are owned largely by European powers, and yet we apprehend no danger from that source. In fact, the Hawaiian Islands are substantially as far from our western shores as Europe is from our eastern, and with all of our years of experience and intercourse I doubt if we would have Europe moved farther away if we could. Are islands in the hands of a foreign power a greater menace to us on the west side than on the east? If so, for what reason?

Would the Hawaiian Islands, under the control of Great Britain, be a source of greater danger to the Pacific coast than the Bermudas, only a few hundred miles away, are to the Atlantic coast? Contingencies may arise that would make the islands of some importance to us as a base of naval operations; conditions might exist under which their occupancy by a foreign power would be a matter of some concern to us. But the question is, Are those contingencies and conditions so likely to exist as to justify us in departing from our historical policy and entering upon the dangerous experiment of territorial expansion? Would they not bring us more evil than good? Six months ago no one would have dreamed of the highly sensational naval conflict that recently occurred at the Philippine Islands.

If that brilliant event could have been foreseen, naval experts would have been profuse in theories favoring the acquisition of territory for strategical purposes in the Orient. Warfare is a succession of surprises, and no wisdom has foresight enough to know where the next battle will be fought. Naval warfare must make its own facilities; it is not within the range of reason that we should acquire possessions all over the globe for naval depots. There are stronger reasons for the acquisition of territory on the continent of Asia for naval purposes than in the center of the Pacific Ocean. If we owned those islands we would be compelled to protect them; they are within 2,000 miles of other islands in the South Sea that could be made the base of formidable naval operations. They can not protect themselves, and Pearl Harbor, however well fortified, could only protect the entrance to Oahu. There are six or seven other inhabited islands in the group, with means of ingress and egress more or less adequate, and they could be approached and devastated by a naval force. They must be protected and the maintenance of a squadron of warships there would be necessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman name one of those harbors?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggested that there were five or six islands with means of ingress and egress more or less adequate. They are approached by commercial agencies; they can be approached by soldiers as well.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask—

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I prefer not to be interrupted. In war we would then be compelled to fight in mid ocean, 2,000 miles from our natural stronghold, where our invincible force could not be available. As we are now situated we can select the theater of action; we can withdraw to our coasts or attack an enemy wherever he is exposed. We have no insular territory to defend and consequently can select the battle ground. Do we desire to surrender that important advantage? Spain had a fortified harbor in Manila as strong as Pearl Harbor, and yet there was a Dewey. Are we to learn nothing from Spain's experience? Her naval outpost at the Philippines is a source of weakness—a cause of her overthrow. She has, in addition, Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Canaries to defend, all far removed from her continental stronghold, and she is helpless.

In the present conflict we can choose the battlefield. We can attack her most vulnerable point. If she had no insular possessions she could withdraw to the continent and be almost invincible against our arms, and yet gentlemen insist that such possessions are a source of military strength. If it had not been for her islands Spain would not have been involved in the war. That is a point of no mean significance. England, with her mighty navy, is compelled to distribute it around over the world so that it can hardly be said to be formidable. The more naval outposts and supply depots a country has scattered over the seas in time of war the more its naval power must be divided. Outlying possessions give rise to complications in ways that can not be foreseen, and that country is safest from disturbance that has the fewest of them, and it is strongest in time of war. They excite jealousies and distrust and breed misunderstandings; they afford a pretext for burdening the productive energies of a country with a large army and navy, and handicap it in the conquest of trade.

But friends of the proposition express the fear that if we continue to maintain the policy of excluding foreign control of the islands we will be involved in dangerous complications with other powers which would be averted by annexation. What has been our experience in that line? During all our relations with the islands we have had infinitely less trouble with them and on their account than we have had with Alaska since our purchase of that Territory. There is now a judgment of half a million dollars standing against us growing out of complications brought with the Alaskan possessions—more than Hawaii has cost us in all her history. It is conclusively demonstrated that annexation multiplies perplexities from which we could otherwise be free.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that if we control the Hawaiian Islands our Pacific coast will be secure from attack, because no war ship can carry coal enough to steam from any other port on the Pacific Ocean, do any fighting, and return. Naval engagements are usually of short duration; a few hours are sufficient to destroy a mighty fleet, so destructive are the implements of warfare. We have existed with safety for a hundred years without control of the Hawaiian Islands, and they grow of less importance to us with every improvement of war ships.

Russia just contracted for a number of war ships and cruisers, some of which are to be constructed by American contractors, and they are to have capacity enough to carry coal to steam from St. Petersburg to Port Arthur, a distance of 17,000 miles. A ship of that capacity could leave Hongkong and run to the Pacific coast, bombard the coast cities for a week, and return without any inconvenience. It could demolish every city on the coast outside of Alaska and have time to spare. With continued improvement and the prospect of revolution in motive power by electricity, warships are likely to be constructed within the next decade that will carry supplies enough to circumnavigate the globe. Our strength is in our isolation and a patriotic citizenship, and our shield is in an attitude of dignity and justice toward all mankind.

The policy of territorial expansion will necessarily involve us in complications in foreign politics, with which we should have no concern. We need no additional territory for any of the purposes of peace, and war is justified only when there is no other honorable recourse. If we intend to annex the islands at all, it would be most unwise to consummate the act in the face of the present situation. Statesmanship will not be misled by the prevailing excitement to do that which might materially cripple us in the prosecution of the present war. We have a foothold on the Philippine Islands, and indiscreet declarations are heard on all hands, that it shall be our policy to permanently occupy them. Foreign countries are apt to misjudge our purposes. Precipitate annexation would be looked upon as a movement preliminary to the complete subjugation of the Philippines, and would be construed as the inauguration of an aggressive policy of territorial expansion. It would excite the apprehension of European powers and lose us their moral support, and perhaps invite intervention against us; our pretension of humanity would be justly regarded as hypocritical cant.

We have our Monroe doctrine, the existence of which is recognized the world over, and by force of an analogous law controlling the politics of the Old World the powers would find abundant justification to intervene and rebuke what they would regard as audacity on the part of this Government.

THE "WAR NECESSITY."

There is nothing in the exigencies of the present war that requires the annexation of the islands. Our occupation of the Philippines, if our protestations and professions are to be regarded, will be only temporary. Unless we permit the war to degenerate from a righteous movement for the relief of oppressed humanity into a greedy conquest for colonial spoils, our military foothold in the Orient will soon terminate. The only need we have for Hawaii now is for a supply station on the line of communication between the continent and the Philippines, and that we have already in our unqualified right to Pearl Harbor for that purpose. Our right to that harbor is complete and exclusive, and our use of it, under the terms of the grant, can not possibly involve the Hawaiian Government in complications, because it has no control over the harbor as against this country.

The grant is in these terms:

His majesty, the King of the Hawaiian Islands, grants to the Government of the United States the exclusive right to enter the harbor of Pearl River, in the Island of Oahu, and to establish and maintain there a coaling and repair station for the use of vessels of the United States, and to that end the United States may improve the entrance to said harbor and do all other things needful to the purpose aforesaid.

If the grant should be terminable with the treaty, which is a debatable question, it could not be terminated by either party under a year, and that, in all probability, will be as long as we will be required to maintain our force in the Philippines, unless it shall be the intention to continue to occupy those islands for the purpose of coercing annexation. The possibility of the Hawaiian Government terminating the treaty is too remote to be worthy of consideration unless the oligarchy should conclude to take the preliminary step in the existing crisis in the hope that it would compel annexation. The stream of gold, at the rate of $6,000,000 a year, flowing from this country into the pockets of the sugar barons in Hawaii is an adequate guaranty that the treaty will continue.

I have no doubt there are influential citizens of those islands who would gladly involve their Government in the existing complications with the view of promoting the scheme of annexation.

Let that Government declare neutrality between the belligerents and its declaration, if honestly kept, will be respected. Let this country depend upon its grant for the use of Pearl Harbor for a supply station and the question will be solved. We will have all that we require and Hawaii will be entirely free from the controversy.

And, besides this, it is an undeniable fact that there is a feasible route from San Francisco to the Philippines by way of our Aleutian possessions which is over 800 miles shorter than the Hawaiian route. It is always open and practicable, and possesses as safe, convenient, and adequate a harbor and supply station as Pearl Harbor. The temperature in the coldest weather is never lower than 7° Fahrenheit, and it very rarely reaches that point. But there have been no sugar kings on the Aleutians to advertise their advantages; consequently that important line has been almost overlooked by the country. It answers every purpose of a supply station in supporting our forces in the Philippines, and we already own it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suppose the gentleman knows that Pearl Harbor can not be entered by a single vessel at the present time, owing to the bar.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I know that the Hawaiian Government has permitted us to store 12,000 or more tons of coal in an accessible harbor, and will subject herself to no liability whatever under the laws of nations in permitting us to go and take that coal.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is in the harbor of Honolulu. The gentleman was talking of Pearl Harbor.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It can make no difference; when we placed our coal there we acquired the right to go after it.

THE ISLANDS WILL NOT GO TO ANOTHER COUNTRY.

But if we don't take the islands some other country will, is the alternative that is submitted to us by the advocates of the proposition. Suppose Mexico should propose political union with this country and notify us that if the proposition were not accepted she would tender a surrender of her sovereignty to France or Germany; do gentlemen confess that we would be remediless? Are they willing to have the Monroe doctrine so construed and limited? I imagine not. We do not want Mexico in our political household, and would resist any proposition that placed her under the control of any European power. The same is true in relation to the Hawaiian Islands. If we do not choose to accept them we will not be estopped to prevent their passing under the dominion of any foreign power. But there is no danger of such a contingency. The specter of foreign control is conjured up for the purpose of exciting our cupidity and apprehension.

Have we forgotten Santo Domingo so quickly? The sugar barons of the islands, who constitute the governing power, realize full well that union with any foreign country would mean the abrogation of the commercial treaty and the loss of their great advantage in the American markets. It would cost them over $5,000,000 a year, and that they will never submit to willingly. There is no liability of their proposing annexation to any other country, and if any power should attempt to take them by conquest this country would immediately prevent it. That fact is a guaranty of their safety from foreign molestation, as no government will take the hazard of a war with this country to possess those islands. There is absolutely no force in the suggestion that they are becoming orientalized and will ultimately go to Japan by absorption.

The Japanese and Chinese laborers on the islands were brought there by the sugar barons under the contract system. Thousands of them were imported by the Dole oligarchy. They are there for fixed terms, and are required to return to their own country when the term of service expires. The treaties require the Hawaiian Government to guarantee the performance of the contracts, and to furnish them transportation back to their homes at the termination of the period of employment. They are not naturalized, and have no political rights. They do not have their families, and are only sojourners. This accounts for the large discrepancy between the sexes on the islands. The sugar growers need their labor, and there is no sentiment for their exclusion.

Japan has evinced no disposition to seize the islands. It is true she protested against annexation to this country, because it would dissolve the Hawaiian sovereignty and destroy the guaranty under the Japanese treaty. Japan quite likely has some concern on account of the well-known hostility of this country toward Mongolian immigration. There need be no fear whatever of annexation to or absorption by any other country as long as we protest. Our protest alone, of which the world already has notice, is a sufficient guaranty of their safety and neutrality.

The operations of European powers in China is a cause for no apprehension on the part of this country. Europe is no more dangerous in Asia than it is in Europe. It is in easy access to our eastern coast, and has given us no disturbance, and it will be equally as harmless in Asia.

HAWAII AND THE PACIFIC COMMERCE.

Mr. Speaker, much importance is attached to the islands because of their relation to the commerce of the Pacific Ocean. There is no reason why we can not fully enjoy their benefits from a commercial standpoint without annexation. We can not hope to profitably extend our foreign trade by the policy of territorial expansion.

Commerce has no sentiment or affection—the ethics of international trade are those of the bargain counter—and the country that has the greatest advantages in production will control the greatest share of the world's trade. We already have Pearl Harbor for a coaling station. All civilized countries are engaged in trade, and they gladly welcome cargoes of commerce into their ports and readily extend hospitalities to the carrying vessels.

It is not necessary that we have a coaling station in our own right wherever we send a trading vessel. Ships are provided with coal in the various parts of the world with as much alacrity as their crews are provided with entertainment at the hotels. What would be thought of the proposition to maintain a United States shoe store in London, so Americans traveling abroad could procure footwear? How many foreign countries have coaling stations upon our coasts? Where have our ships gone on commercial missions that they have had any difficulty in procuring coal if any was to be had?

Who is ready to confess, in the face of our marvelous growth, that our commercial policy has been a failure? Sir, with high-priced labor and high rate of interest in this country our producers have made wonderful conquests in the world's markets in the last few years. Our foreign trade is increasing at an unparalleled rate, notwithstanding the many disadvantages we labor under and the proverbial wastefulness of the American people. The manufacturing nations of the Old World, by force of habit and surroundings, are compelled to maintain enormously expensive standing armies and navies. It has been said that every toiler in Germany has to carry a soldier or a sailor on his back.

Those countries are badly handicapped by that condition, from which we are now comparatively free. Our isolation is our principal safeguard, and the advantages it contains has enabled us to achieve remarkable triumphs in production and trade. We do not realize the enormous advantage our position gives us, or there would be no sentiment in favor of surrendering it. The burden is so great on foreign countries that they are now contemplating a treaty for the purpose of limiting, by mutual covenant, the size of their armies and navies. It is shortsighted and suicidal for us to enter upon a policy that will take from us the important advantage we now enjoy.

Our trade can never be extended by cannon or warships, but it will continue to increase until we have achieved commercial supremacy, if we do not surrender the immense advantage we now possess. Our strength is not, and will never be, in our Army and Navy, but in the contentment and intelligence of our citizenship. Our greatest danger is not from external force, but from internal discontent and disintegration. As long as our people are united in sentiment and prosperous we are invincible against the whole world, but if we are torn by discord and shattered by discontent our strength will depart though we have the mightiest navy that ever rode the seas. We are strongest when the burdens of Government are lightest.

I deprecate the policy that would cause this country to take from the multitude their hard-earned substance, so much needed in industrial development, to build a navy equal to those maintained by the European powers. The policy of territorial expansion will compel us to do that. It would be immeasurably better in an emergency to go into the markets of the world to buy war ships and cruisers than to invest millions upon millions of money in times of peace, needed in developing production, to the construction of floating palaces of steel and have them rust and rot on the sea.

A large navy does not, in my judgment, tend to secure peace. Nations, like individuals, often act upon impulse, and if there be time for reflection difficulties may be settled amicably and war obviated. Does any gentleman on this floor contend that it would promote domestic peace for all of our citizens to carry firearms and dirk knives in their daily intercourse? That which is true of individuals is likewise true of nations.

I am in favor of a navy reasonably commensurate with our necessities, considering our isolated situation. I would have war ships sufficient for coast police and defensive purposes and a reasonable nucleus, in addition, for offensive operations; but I would not unnecessarily burden the people of the country for the support of a great navy just for its glory.

If we take the proposed step in this crisis, it will surely launch us upon a policy of territorial aggression and colonial imperialism, carrying complications in all parts of the earth, and our national peace will be constantly threatened. I warn gentlemen that thirst for power is a dangerous passion and hard to satisfy, for it will not be controlled by reason. The appeal to national pride always has a fascination hard to resist, and it is doubly powerful when the public mind is in an abnormal state of excitement, as it is to-day. The wisdom of statesmanship would defer action upon matters of such high importance until the passions of war subside and conditions will permit calm consideration.

This is a Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," and I have faith in its splendid destiny and am jealous of its great powers, fearful always that they may, through excessive zeal or mistaken judgment, be perverted. Let us try no dangerous or uncertain experiment; let us hesitate to change a policy the success of which is the acknowledged envy of the world; let us profit by the wrecks of nations and individuals who were not satisfied to let well enough alone. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] such time as he may desire.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time that has been allotted me to discuss this question I will be compelled to confine myself to only a few points. I confess that up to a recent date I was opposed to the annexation of any more territory by the United States, but a condition of things has arisen in connection with the war with Spain that in my opinion makes the annexation of Hawaii a military necessity, and I shall vote for it just as I voted to give the soldiers in camp the right to vote in our elections and as I voted for the war-revenue bill, in spite of the fact that it had been hampered by certain Senate amendments to which I am opposed, some of which I deemed inexpedient, and one of which I regarded as a violation of a principle which was advocated by the sound-money people of this country in 1896.

The responsibility for this latter amendment, namely, the compulsory coinage of one and one-half million dollars of silver monthly, I shall leave to those who fathered it. These measures are demanded by the exigencies of the times, and, being necessary to the successful conduct of the war and the upholding of the hands of the Administration now, I vote for them. When we recognize that Hawaii is only about 2,100 miles from our Pacific coast, and that the heaviest battle ship, steaming at the rate of 15 miles an hour, can reach it in less than six days, and that it took more than that time for George Washington to move his army from the neighborhood of Philadelphia to Yorktown in 1781, we can see how conditions have changed since then and how thoroughly fallacious it is to quote, as others have done, the sayings of Washington about the acquirement of other territory. The principles enunciated by Washington are correct, but the application of the principles vary under varying conditions. Since his day we have acquired much territory, some by conquest and some by purchase.

Alaska is practically farther away from us than Hawaii. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, it appears to be a well-settled fact that the judgment of the American people demands this annexation, and as one of their representatives, since they are in favor of the verdict, I am not disposed to set myself up as the "stubborn twelfth juror."

Naval battles were heretofore fought by ships with sails, that could be absent for years from their base of supply; to-day the most powerful battle ship is unable to exert her power either for offense or defense unless supplied with coal. It is said we have by treaty a coaling station in Hawaii which is sufficient to supply our needs in that direction.

Will it not be as hard, or, indeed, harder, for us to defend this station in time of war should other nations assail it as it would be for us to defend the whole island as part of our territory? But, Mr. Speaker, all these questions have been gone over and more ably discussed than it is possible for me to do. I will confine myself solely to one objection which has been raised in opposition to the annexation of this territory, namely, the existence of leprosy there.

It has been said that we will be annexing a colony of lepers to spread the disease over the United States. This shows the great ignorance on the part of some people in regard to this disease. What is leprosy? Osler, who is the author of one of our best and most modern works on medicine and who stands as high as anyone else in medical authority, defines it to be—

A chronic infectious disease caused by the bacillus lepræ, characterized by the presence of tubercular nodules in the skin and mucous membranes (tubercular leprosy) or by changes in the nerves (anæsthetic leprosy). At first these forms may be separate, but ultimately both are combined, and in the characteristic form there are disturbances of sensation.

The disease is widespread and there is a popular belief that it is on the increase.

Osler says:

It is one of the oldest of known diseases. At present it prevails widely, particularly in hot countries. In India it is estimated that there are over 250,000 lepers. In Europe, where it prevailed in the Middle Ages, it has become almost unknown, except in Norway and the Orient. It exists in the Gulf States and extensively in Mexico.

At Key West, Berger states that there are 100 cases, and Blanc found 40 cases in New Orleans. In the Northwestern States a few cases exist among the Norwegian and Icelandic settlers. On the Pacific coast cases are seen not infrequently among the Chinese.

An endemic focus is at Tracadie, New Brunswick; a few cases are also met with in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. At Tracadie, which is on a bay of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the disease is limited to two or three counties which are settled by French Canadians. The disease was imported from Norway about the end of the last century. The cases are confined in a lazaretto, to which place they are sent as soon as the disease is manifest. I made a visit to the settlement two years ago with a medical officer, A. C. Smith, of Chatham, at which time there were only eighteen patients in the hospital. It is interesting to note that the disease was gradually diminished by segregation; formerly there were over forty under surveillance.

The disease attacks all classes and persons of all ages. It is probably communicated by contagion. Inoculation was successfully performed by Arning in a Hawaiian convict. Graham, who, some years ago, carefully investigated the Tracadie settlement, came to the conclusion that the disease was very probably transmitted by contagion, and A. O. Smith, the present medical officer, tells me that he knows of no facts which are opposed to that view. It is, however, only contagious in the same sense as syphilis, and just as accidental contamination with this virus is extremely rare so it is with leprosy. The closest possible contact may take place for years, as between parent and child, without transmission, and not one of the Sisters of Charity who have for more than forty years so faithfully nursed the lepers at Tracadie has contracted the disease.

It is difficult to explain the rapid spread of the disease in the Sandwich Islands on any other view than contagion, and yet it is strange that there is no evidence of a primary lesion or external sore comparable to that of syphilis. Morrow states that—

In the immense majority of cases the disease is propagated by sexual congress. The disappearance of the disease in the Middle Ages no doubt resulted from isolation enforced at that time. The disease had possibly, in some instances, been transmitted by vaccination. Hereditary transmission can not be excluded, and there is no good reason why the disease should not be communicated, as in syphilis, from parent to child.

Hansen, of Bergen, first discovered this organism, which has many points of resemblance to the bacillus tuberculosis, but can be differentiated from it. It occurs in extraordinary numbers in the tuberculous tissue. It has been cultivated successfully (Bales), but inoculation experiments on animals have been negative.

I quote this high authority, as it clearly defines the disease much better than I could. My object is to show that, while it is a disease that is hard to cure by medicine and which is very chronic, running from three to twenty-two years in the tuberculated cases and in the anæsthetic cases running from five to thirty-five years, its ability of contagion is very slight.

The words infection and contagion here, it is well to say, can not well be separated and defined differently in the light of the modern germ theory. A man may take into his system a germ that has emanated from the body of another and become infected through the atmosphere or by the water he drinks, or he may by actual contact with a person be infected by the germ direct. These are confusing terms for many, but they may be regarded almost as convertible.

It is not my intention to give a dissertation upon medicine, but simply to state that the most enlightened medical opinions of to-day show that by proper cleanliness and nutritious food and the isolation of infected subjects this disease may be stamped out. For years past in the Hawaiian Islands a colony for the segregation of lepers has been established at Molokai; but while the number of lepers on these islands has diminished to a considerable extent under this system, the safeguards which have been thrown around the colony to prevent the spread of the disease have been defective in many respects. Friends and kokuas (or helpers) have been permitted to associate on the most intimate terms with the lepers. These kokuas receive no rations from the Government, and in many instances are reported as having tried to catch the disease that they might be fed and clothed and furnished with tobacco free of cost as the lepers were.

In an article on "Leprosy in Hawaii," published in Berlin at the time of the recent international leprosy conference, and written by Dr. J. Ashburn Thomason, of Sydney, he says:

As the good management of the settlement became better known and natives began to see that lepers, once deported, had no cares, but were fed, clothed, and furnished with tobacco, without any need to work for the rest of their lives, many persons actually sought to acquire the disease in order that they might share that fortunate lot. So that while all natives would without hesitation, and apparently without noticing the unsightly and sometimes disgusting aspect presented by the lepers, continue to live in ordinary household intimacy with them, there sprung up a number who are reputed to have actually done their best to acquire leprosy.

As regards natives outside the settlement, Mr. Meyer told me that he had recently reproved a dozen men whom he found eating out of the same pot bowl with a tuberculated leper advanced in illness (pot being eaten by dipping the fingers in the sticky mass and sucking them); but the only answer he got from the party was given by one who at last said, sententiously, "Do you call it a bad disease? I say it is good. If I catch it, what then? I shall go to the settlement and work no more." As regards natives already within the settlement, though not affected, Dr. Swift, at that time resident physician, wrote to the board in 1893: "Let it be understood (for I can prove it) that to be a leper is a desideratum; if not on the outside, it is so at the settlement;" and, "Let me state that I can at any time get twenty or twenty-five Kokuas to submit to inoculation with a view of contracting the disease, to the end that they may be endowed with the privileges and supplied with the rations of the regular leper."

Strange to say, in spite of these disgusting facts and the laxity of the segregation of the lepers, only a very few of these Kokuas contracted the disease. The original holders of the territory on which the settlement is located, known as Kamaainas, and who live there still on their property, have been singularly exempt from the disease, although they associate constantly with the lepers. The report of the American representative to the Berlin conference has not yet been printed, but I have ascertained that said report will confirm the idea that leprosy may be stamped out by proper quarantine regulations. Much confusion existed as to the true character of this disease prior to the isolation of the bacillus lepræ. Now its real nature is understood, and its extermination or confinement to a few localities may be well assured by proper legislation and governmental control.

Despite the large number of lepers in India it was stated by Dr. Phineas S. Abraham, of London, before the Berlin conference, as follows:

In 1889 Sir James N. Dick, K. C. B., the director of the medical department of the navy, informed me that "not a single case of leprosy among the officers or men of the navy could be traced in the office," and at the same date the late Sir Thomas Crawford, K. C. B., director of the army medical department, could discover but little evidence of the disease among the British troops. Only one case, indeed, had come to light, viz. in a soldier taken in Madras, whose father was an Irishman and mother a native. Sir Thomas Dick has also, upon the present occasion, kindly investigated the matter, and he has been able to state again that no case of leprosy has ever occurred in the navy.

The present director-general of the army medical department has also been good enough to have the records of the service again examined, and it appears that—

During the past ten years only one case of leprosy has been reported to have occurred among the British troops and non-European troops (exclusive of native troops) in India. This case appears in the annual report for the Madras command for the year 1890. It is probably the one referred to above.

I could multiply these statistics to a great extent, but I have not time, nor will I worry you with such quotations. I will conclude by quoting the following.

In the transactions of the American Dermatological Association for 1883 a report by Drs. Fox and Graham is given which embodies the results of their combined investigations. The following ten propositions were submitted by them as their deductions from the facts observed:

First. Leprosy is a constitutional disease, and in certain cases appears to be hereditary.

Second. It is undoubtedly contagious by inoculation.

Third. There is no reason for believing that it is transmitted in any other way.

Fourth. Under certain conditions a person may have leprosy and run no risk of transmitting the disease to others of the same household or community.

Fifth. It is not so liable to be transmitted to others as is syphilis in its early stages. There is no relation between the two diseases.

Sixth. Leprosy is usually a fatal disease, its average duration being from ten to fifteen years.

Seventh. In rare instances there is a tendency to recover after the disease has existed for many years.

Eighth. There are no valid grounds for pronouncing the disease incurable.

Ninth. Judicious treatment usually improves the condition of the patient and often causes a disappearance of the symptoms.

Tenth. There is ground for the hope that an improved method of treatment will in time effect the cure of leprosy, or at least that it will arrest and control the disease.

Walter Wyman, M. D., Supervising Surgeon-General United States Marine-Hospital Service, in the Medical News of June 16, 1894, in an article on the national control of leprosy, says:

National control of leprosy within the United States has been frequently advocated, particularly by State and municipal boards of health when finding such cases upon their hands and desirous of being relieved of their care. The arguments for such control, of course, are based upon the presumption of the contagiousness of the disease (even though moderately contagious), and also upon the claim that where no segregation of cases or no supervision of cases not colonized is enforced the disease gradually increases in prevalence and that where segregation and colonization have been enforced the disease has been made to disappear.

Granted that the danger of contagion is small; granted, in the language of another, that a case of leprosy within a family should be regarded with less concern in its relation to the health of the remaining members of the family than a case of tuberculosis; granted that the disease appears chiefly among the lower classes. In the movement which is now only near the starting point, but which promises to be a controlling movement, and which will mark the close of the present century and the beginning of the next, so far as medical science is concerned, as distinctly as any other evidence of progress in the healing art (I refer to the settled resolution to exterminate every contagious disease), it would appear to be incumbent on the profession to leave nothing undone to exterminate this, together with other communicable diseases. Now, with regard to national control, there are two considerations involved.

First. Does the right of national control exist?

Second. If it does, how may that right be exercised?

Concerning the first consideration, I find a difference of opinion among eminent medical men with whom I have conversed, based upon their different views regarding the Constitution of the United States. A strict constructionist will inform you that the United States Government can only legislate in accordance with powers expressly delegated by the Constitution, and that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution applies as a qualifying clause to the specified prerogatives—that the latter are only granted when necessary for the general welfare.

The Doctor says again:

For this purpose, and that Congress may be assured that the medical profession and sanitary officers had not acted upon insufficient premise, it is suggested that a leprosy commission should be appointed, of three or five members, to make report upon the prevalence of leprosy in the United States and the necessity and proper method of its control. A preliminary bill might be introduced, empowering the President to appoint such a commission, and as the success of the bill would be enhanced if it called for an additional appropriation, there might be included a provision setting aside a portion of what is known as the "epidemic fund" to meet the expense of this commission. Whether a national leper hospital would be the result of this action or not, a commission of this character would cause a sense of relief to the people of the United States, whatever its conclusions, either affirmative or negative, as to such an establishment. As for myself, I believe that leprosy should be under national control.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in the ideas expressed by Dr. Wyman, and I think this Congress should at once take measures to pass such a bill. I also favor a national quarantine law as the one method by which we can prevent and control the spread of any infectious diseases in the United States. I believe, sir, that our forefathers in constructing the Constitution gave us under the general-welfare clause ample powers to protect the people against disease. I am not one of those who believe in that parietic view of the Constitution that is taken by certain "statesmen" whom we find here crying out for a crippled and narrow-minded construction of that instrument. We are now truly one people, and the Constitution is sufficiently elastic to protect us in every way.

By taking a few of the islands of the sea we are but extending our pickets for the protection of our homes. Along with the military features of this extension I have particularly dwelt with this subject of leprosy, as it is much misunderstood by our people. It is a loathsome disease, but not beset with the horrors with which it is painted. I have said nothing that is original, but I believe it all to be true, in the light of modern medical knowledge. It may be well for people to know it, and to disabuse their minds of the scarecrow which some people have attempted to make of it. The power, the energy, and the inventive genius of the United States I believe is capable to meet any emergency and protect itself and its people against any conditions that may hereafter arise. Let us use this power for the good of the people in every way, and let us, in the light of modern science, adopt an advanced and liberal policy whereby we may overwhelm our enemies, whether they come as martial hosts in all the panoply of war or in the insidious forms of disease. I will add that it is estimated there are about 250 lepers in the United States.

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HILBORN].

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, one Sunday morning, only a few weeks ago, there occurred in the harbor of Manila the most remarkable sea fight the world has ever seen.

It was notable for the faultless strategy of the commander of the American squadron and the valor of the officers and men under his command.

We are proud of the matchless heroism displayed by the American seamen, and we are proud, also, of the American mechanics who built the vessels and guns which made the victory possible.

Future generations will be slow to believe that a squadron of unarmored vessels met and destroyed the entire squadron of the enemy, as well as its forts, without the loss of a ship or a man.

That fight will also be memorable for its effect upon the American people. It has changed the thoughts, the aspirations, and the policy of the American people. They arose from the perusal of the story of that naval engagement a changed people. It marks an epoch in our history, if not in the history of the world.

Our nation is like a man who suddenly finds himself mysteriously endowed with the gigantic strength of a Samson. How is America to use this strength in the future?

Our policy as a nation has been a policy of peace. We took no heed of the contentions of nations striving for territorial aggrandizement.

We were content to build up and develop this continent which God had given us for a home. The world looks upon us now as a martial nation, ready to participate in the struggles which change the map of the world.

When we went into this war we solemnly proclaimed to the world that we desired no new territory, and we meant it. But a power greater than the American people has ordained otherwise. Without design on our part, we have been irresistibly swept into a position where we must become a warlike nation.

Our army of occupation is now on its way to the Philippine Islands. Many of our brave boys will find there their last resting place.

Miles of headstones will mark the burial place of soldiers from every State of the American Union.

To thousands of American mothers there will be a spot in those far-away islands which will be hallowed ground.

No foreign flag will ever wave over an American burial ground where rest America's brave defenders.

To whom shall we surrender these islands? To Spain? No; we must never permit that country to repeat her practice of misrule.

To what nation can we transfer these islands without complications with other nations? I fear there is only one course left open to us, and that is permanent occupation of the Philippine Islands.

However distasteful it may be to us, there seems to be no alternative. And what is true of these islands in the far Pacific is also true of the islands under Spanish rule in the Atlantic. To maintain our flag where we shall plant it on two oceans and protect our citizens and our commerce will require a large navy and a large army.

The objection to the annexation of Hawaii has been that it meant the overturning of our traditions for a century. Those are overturned already.

That annexation meant a large army and navy.

They are already necessary. That the territory is not contiguous; that the people are not of our race; that they are incapable of taking on our civilization—these problems are already upon us, and annexation will not render the solution more difficult.

Hawaii will constitute one of the stepping-stones in the ford upon which our Government can place its feet in crossing the Pacific to reach our more distant possessions in the Orient. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHOWALTER].

Mr. SHOWALTER. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas, in his eloquent speech Saturday, said he was opposed to the annexation of Hawaii because it was a departure from the traditions of the fathers. I take issue with the gentleman, and declare it is not a departure from the practice of our Government, from its early existence down to the present time.

The great apostle of Democracy, Thomas Jefferson, from whom my friend from Arkansas draws his inspiration, believed in the acquisition of valuable territory when he negotiated from Napoleon the great Louisiana purchase, that great and inestimable act. He also believed in it when afterwards, in a letter to a friend, he declared in favor of the annexation of Cuba. In fact, sir, it has been the policy of our Government to acquire territory from its early existence. One needs only to look at the map of the original thirteen States to be convinced that our policy has been to acquire more territory. Unfortunate, indeed, would it have been for the cause of liberty and self-government by the people had a short-sighted policy, such as is now advocated by the opposition to this bill, prevailed in the time of Jefferson and on down through the time of Grant and Seward.

The gentleman forgets, when he declares this is a departure, that we already own many islands of the sea. We own the Aleutian Islands, which reach a thousand miles farther west in the Pacific than Honolulu. We own Midway Island, the westernmost of the Hawaiian group. We own some seventy other islands in the Pacific and Caribbean Sea.

From the day that our Government sent its representative to the Hawaiian Islands, in 1820, down to the present hour, American influences have predominated and, in a sense, controlled them, and have excluded all foreign influences, with the view and intent of ultimate annexation. Secretary John M. Clayton, in 1850, in a dispatch to our minister at Paris, declared the United States could never allow Hawaii to be controlled by any other power. Secretary W. L. Marcy, in 1853, in a letter to our minister to France, declared Hawaii must be controlled by the United States, and foreshadowed annexation. Secretary William H. Seward, in a letter to our minister at Honolulu in 1867, declared that annexation was deemed desirable by the United States. Secretary Hamilton Fish, in a dispatch to our minister at Honolulu in 1873, declared that this Government could not assent to the transfer of their control to that of any powerful maritime or commercial nation. Secretary James G. Blaine, in a dispatch to our minister at Honolulu in 1881, declared Hawaii the key to the dominion of the American Pacific, and declared that should it be impracticable for Hawaii to maintain a benevolent neutrality, this Government would then unhesitatingly meet the altered situation by seeking an avowedly American solution for the grave issues presented.

In a further dispatch he says the Government of the United States has always avowed and now repeats that under no circumstances will it permit the transfer of the territory or sovereignty of these islands to any of the great European powers. Secretary John W. Foster, in the report accompanying the treaty negotiation in 1893, says: "The policy of the United States has been consistently and constantly declared against any foreign aggression in Hawaii inimical to the necessarily paramount rights and interests of the American people there, and the uniform contemplation of their annexation as a contingent necessity." But beyond that it is shown that annexation has been on more than one occasion avowed as a policy and attempted as a fact.

General Schofield says he went to Hawaii twenty years ago to look the question over from a military point of view. He made a report that he regarded annexation inevitable and but a matter of time, but the conditions were not then ripe for it. He says there can be no doubt now about the time, and that it should be the outcome of the present negotiations.

Capt. A. T. Mahan, the great naval expert and author, says:

The United States finds herself compelled to make a decision. * * * Whether we wish to or no, we must make the decision. * * * To anyone viewing a map that shows the full extent of the Pacific, * * * two circumstances will be strikingly and immediately apparent. He will see at a glance that the Sandwich Islands stand by themselves in a state of comparative isolation, amid a vast expanse of sea; and, again, that they form the center of a large circle whose radius is approximately the distance from Honolulu to San Francisco. * * * This is substantially the same distance as from Honolulu to the Gilbert, Marshall, Samoan, and Society Islands, all under European control except Samoa, in which we have a part influence. * * *

Remarkable strategical position of Hawaii.—To have a central position such as this, and to be alone, having no rival and admitting no rival, * * * are conditions that at once fix the attention of the strategist. * * * But to this striking combination is to be added the remarkable relations borne * * * to the great commercial routes traversing this vast expanse. * * * Too much stress can not be laid upon the immense disadvantage to us of any maritime enemy having a coaling station well within 2,500 miles, as this is, of every point of our coast line from Puget Sound to Mexico. Were there many others available, we might find it difficult to exclude from all. There is, however, but the one. Shut out from the Sandwich Islands as a coal base, an enemy is thrown back for supplies of fuel to distances of 3,500 or 4,000 miles—or between 7,000 and 8,000 going and coming—an impediment to sustained maritime operations well-nigh prohibitive. * * * It is rarely that so important a factor in the attack or defense of a coast line—of a sea frontier—is concentrated in a single position, and the circumstance renders doubly imperative upon us to secure it if we righteously can.

Mr. Speaker, we must take Hawaii in or else we must absolutely keep hands off and allow her to drift helplessly into the arms of an Asiatic or European power. We can not fold our arms and sit idly down and say to her and to the nations of the world, we do not want you, we will not take you, nor will we permit you to seek or other nations to give you shelter. When we look back over the record of the last eighty years, and see that during that time these islands have been taken once by Russia, once by England, and twice by France, and quite recently an endeavor to capture them by colonization and absorption by Japan, and which was only prevented by negotiations for annexation, we can not close our eyes to the fact that other nations are quite willing, in fact very willing, and anxious to take in Hawaii; and if now, when they are tendered to us by a unanimous vote of the Hawaiian Senate, we absolutely refuse to accept the proffered gift, we can not in right, in justice, in law interpose any obstacle, any objection, to them seeking an alliance elsewhere. Nor can we object to any other power thus absorbing them. Is there an American who loves his country and who desires her future peace, tranquillity, and glory who wishes to see a foreign power in possession of these islands?

From the coasts of Japan and China to the Golden Gate, from Alaska to the equator, there is but one place in the Pacific where food, water, and coal can be obtained; that place is Hawaii. The roads of the Pacific with Hawaii ours, our Pacific coast can be protected easier than without them. It has been repeatedly officially stated by naval authorities that the trans-Pacific countries and islands, with the exception of Hawaii, are so far distant from the American coast that unless the ships of such nations can recoil at Hawaii it is practically impossible for them to get to our coast for effective military operations. If this is true—and who is there to deny it?—does not common sense dictate to us to possess them, to close Hawaii to them all, and thus make our Pacific coast unassailable?

It is evident to everyone that the Hawaiians are unable to maintain themselves against any foreign power. They are weak and helpless. They are a tempting bait to the nations of the Old World. Let us remove this tempting bait. Let us do it for our own protection, for the protection of a helpless friendly power, and for the protection of the future peace of the world.

The possession of these islands has now become a military necessity; we need them in our business. The flag of the Republic now waves over Cavite, in the harbor of Manila. The unparalleled victory of Commodore Dewey and his gallant officers and men has made plain our duty. We owe it to these dauntless American heroes, whose bravery, courage, and skill have added luster to our flag and imperishable honor, glory, and fame to the American Navy, to at once annex these islands. We owe it to the Government at Honolulu, that has steadily proven its friendship, that opened its port to our war ships and our soldiers, and has thrown itself liable for heavy damages by thus breaking the laws of neutrality, to annex them and thus secure and protect them. It would be an act of cruel injustice and one the American people would never condone should we refuse to do so.

Mr. Speaker, from the day that our noble battle ship with her 266 brave seamen went down to death in the bark, sullen, and mysterious waters of Havana Harbor, victims of cruel, treacherous Spanish hatred, I knew, every one who felt the public pulse knew, that nothing but armed intervention in the affairs of Cuba to the end that the struggling patriots fighting for liberty and independence should triumph, would appease the just and awful wrath of an aroused, awakened American conscience. Mr. Speaker, we have entered upon a war for humanity, the most holy war ever waged. We have entered upon a struggle to rescue and succor starving childhood and outraged womanhood, over 300,000 of whose starved and outraged bodies have enriched the soil of Cuba in the last three years.

That we did right every liberty-loving, patriotic citizen believes. We expected no recompense except the approval of our own conscience and the smiles of an approving God. That we are to be recompensed by the acquisition of valuable territory is now apparent. That the results of this war will be of inestimable value to us as a nation is now a certainty. That it will result in a wider, fuller, and better knowledge of us and our institutions by the civilized nations of the world is also a certainty.

When we have fought this war to a glorious finish and the Stars and Stripes wave proudly over Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines, let us build a navy that will have no equal upon the seas. Let us take our place as the greatest maritime power upon the earth. Let us foster our merchant marine, our shipbuilding interests, until their numbers become as countless as the stars in the blue vault of heaven, sailing every sea, and commanding the commerce of every zone.

Let us build the Nicaraguan Canal, connecting the Atlantic and Pacific, which will unite the nations of the Western Hemisphere in one indissoluble bond of commercial and trade relations, giving us the supremacy not only in the trade of these countries but also in the trade with Japan and the countries of the Orient. How necessary it becomes, then, from a trade point of view, that we should own the Hawaiian Islands; that this "crossroads of the Pacific" should belong to America; that our ships, carrying the commerce of every clime, should have a safe, friendly harbor in their long voyages across the Pacific, a home harbor, where all their necessities may be supplied and where they may be welcomed under the Stars and Stripes.

Mr. Speaker, the guns of the immortal Dewey and his brave men have boomed in the dawning of a new day, when American ideas, American civilization and commerce, and American Christianity shall permeate and influence every section of this old earth of ours, and will hasten the coming of that glad day yet hidden in the womb of time, to which faith looks forward with ardent joy, when war shall be no more, when one law shall bind all nations, tongues, and creeds, and that law shall be the law of universal brotherhood. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SNOVER].

Mr. SNOVER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a glance at the map of the world and a careful study of the situation of the Hawaiian Islands and their relations to the coasts of the Pacific Ocean must be followed by the conviction that possession and control of them are absolutely essential to the United States. They are a necessity to this Government. The logic of the events that have transpired in the present year has impressed this upon the mind and judgment of every thinking man as never before. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] on Saturday last, in speaking upon this question, paid a well-deserved tribute to General Jackson and drew a glowing picture of the battle of New Orleans and of the magnificent achievement of the conqueror of Florida, with inferior numbers of raw and undisciplined volunteers, over the seasoned veterans who had fought under the eye of Wellington in Spain, and closed the incident with the question, "Did he need any island behind him?"

I would without hesitation answer "No." General Jackson, however, like the skillful general he was, took advantage of every resource in his control to make his position secure, to place every possible obstacle in the pathway of the attacking foe, and obtained a great victory under apparently adverse circumstances. If the possession of an island would have added in the slightest degree to his military resources, or would have furnished an additional means of defense to his army or country, the same iron will that afterwards, in 1833, nullified nullification would not have hesitated to take an island or anything else to aid his purpose. And right here let us look for a moment at the wonderful changes that have taken place since that time which have revolutionized military methods and changed political theories.

The battle of New Orleans was fought January 8, 1815. The treaty of Ghent was signed on December 24, 1814, two weeks before, so that the bloodiest battle of the war of 1812 was fought long after the signing of peace articles, and had not the slightest influence on the result.

The news of the signing of the treaty of Ghent was not received here until some weeks after the battle, for the reason that communications over the ocean were only possible by means of sailing vessels, the swiftest of which required from a month to six weeks to cross the Atlantic. The power of steam for the propulsion of vessels was practically unknown. It was not applied to railroads until 1830, and the use of electricity for transmission of news did not commence until 1844. Since then space has been annihilated, so far as the transmission of news is concerned, and for other purposes far distant States and nations are as close together now as towns of adjoining counties were at that time.

The signing of the treaty of peace between Spain and the United States, wherever it takes place, whether at London, Berlin, Paris, St. Petersburg, Geneva, or Hongkong, will be known in every nook and corner of the globe within as many minutes as it required weeks to communicate the treaty of Ghent. One can now converse with his friend as if sitting by his side, even when so far apart as New York and Chicago; and the hour is near at hand when oral conversation will be possible between London and San Francisco or Boston and Honolulu. Steam and electricity have become the absorbing factors in all the problems of the age, whether military or civic, private or public, local or general.

In all our wars with foreign nations up to the present difficulty with Spain our naval vessels were built of wood, and the motive power was the wind, a power universal and omnipresent, accessible to all nations and individuals, and ever ready to do the will of the mariner, whether in peaceful or warlike pursuits.

Given free access to the motive power, an equal footing with competitors, American genius, ingenuity, and skill have always been able to build ships of a speed and strength equaled by few of the modern nations and excelled by none. With wooden ships and broad sails spread to the wind, manned by our hardy seamen and commanded by men whose names will ever shine in history and be household words throughout the Republic, the United States Navy covered itself with glory in our earlier wars.

The Bon Homme Richard, the Constitution, the Wasp, the Peacock, the President, are proud names in our early annals, and the fame of John Paul Jones, Decatur, Hull, Bainbridge, Perry, and McDonough have not faded by the addition to the record of the names of the heroes of our civil war, Farragut, Porter, Cushing, and Ericsson—who won distinction in a new type of vessel—and will not grow dim before the transcendent glory of the heroes of the present year, Dewey and Hobson. The clumsy man-of-war of the sixteenth century would have been able to defeat the multitude of Roman galleys that battled for the control of the world at Actium.

Nelson's flagship at Trafalgar would have been more than a match for the fleets of Christian and Moslem that met at Lepanto, and the battle ship of to-day, single handed and alone, could destroy the combined squadrons of France and Great Britain that contested for the supremacy of the Mediterranean at Aboukir. Heavy guns, power of resistance to projectiles, and, above all, speed, are the essential elements in the naval contests of the present. Motive power obtained by harnessing the winds can no longer be relied upon. The wooden sailing frigate is obsolete.

The efficiency of the modern naval squadron depends very largely upon its supply of coal and its ability to replenish its supply as fast as it is exhausted. Without coal its motive power is gone and its great guns useless. Such being the case, the strategic importance of the Hawaiian Islands as a coaling and refitting station for that part of our Navy stationed in the Pacific Ocean must be recognized, as well as the importance of preventing its falling into the hands of those with whom future complications may arise, in which case, instead of being a bulwark of defense, it would be a vantage ground of offense and a menace to our Pacific coast.

President Tyler, as early as 1842, recognized the superior interests of the United States in these islands, and said, in substance, that the Government should prevent any of the great powers from gaining control of them. This was at a time when the importance to us was infinitely less than now. If the United States annexes Hawaii she will be able to advance her line of defense 2,000 miles westward from the Pacific coast.

In 1823, when the celebrated Monroe doctrine was first promulgated, we had very little Pacific coast to defend, and under the conditions of naval warfare at that time Hawaii was of no special importance to us. But their annexation to-day is in strict consonance with every principle involved in the Monroe doctrine. It will do more to preserve "America for Americans" than many millions invested in battle ships, will make those already built available, and will make the islands a perpetual warning to all hostile and prying powers to keep hands off the affairs of the American republics, great and small.

Annexation has been favored by some of our greatest statesmen and military commanders. Annexation is desired by the Hawaiian Government itself. It is, I believe, eagerly hoped for by the great majority of our people. The Delphic Oracle charged the Greeks to depend on their navy, their "wooden walls." The navy of England has been her great means of defense and offense for hundreds of years, and has given her the proud place she holds among the nations. Our Navy has been a source of pride to us from its very infancy.

Since the commencement of the present war with Spain it has increased our prestige a hundredfold, and has caused our flag to be honored and respected in the four quarters of the globe as never before in our history. It seems to me that it would be more than a blunder, that it would be almost a crime, to refuse annexation offered to us by a willing people and of so much importance and value to us. Let us not be like the base Indian, who "threw a pearl away richer than all his tribe." [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. DE VRIES] such time as he may desire.

[Mr. DE VRIES addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER].

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the proposition now under consideration is one of the utmost importance to the country. Since the question was presented to us in such an attractive form, and the Government and people of the Hawaiian Islands sought admission into the Union under the Administration of General Harrison, I have taken a lively interest in it and have been an ardent friend of the cause of annexation. As I have carefully noted the progress of the war and observed each day the developments in the Orient, my interest in the subject has intensified and the reasons for annexation of this group of islands have increased, or at least become more apparent to me. While our attention has been particularly drawn to this question during the past five or six years, it is by no means a novel one to our people, the inhabitants of Hawaii, or the citizens of other great powers.

During the past century the people of these islands have had a stormy time. They have been seized twice by France and by Great Britain. These respective governments have released them only upon diplomatic pressure from other powers. In 1854 negotiations were had between the United States and the King providing for a treaty of annexation, but before they were consummated the King died. We are all familiar with the progress of the treaty in 1893. While the treaty was pending in the Senate a change of Administration took place and President Cleveland withdrew it. The conduct of foreign affairs under his Administration, so far as the same related to the Hawaiian Islands, was most unsatisfactory to the American people. A treaty of annexation similar to the joint resolution now pending was agreed to by the Hawaiian Government and ratified by the Senate.

The position assumed by a majority of our Presidents and many of our leading statesmen since 1842 in reference to these islands is well known. In June, 1851, Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State, addressed the American minister at Paris instructing him to advise the French Government that the enforcement of the French demands against Hawaii—would be tantamount to the subjugation of the islands to the dominion of France. A step like this could not fail to be viewed by the Government and people of the United States with a dissatisfaction which would tend seriously to disturb our existing friendly relations with the French Government.

In a correspondence with United States Minister Severance at Honolulu a few weeks later the same distinguished premier said:

The Hawaiian Islands are ten times nearer to the United States than to any of the powers of Europe. Five-sixths of all their commercial intercourse is with the United States, and these considerations, together with others of a more general character, have fixed the course which the Government of the United States will pursue in regard to them.

At this time the French were so threatening and persistent in their demands, and the situation being represented in person by our consul to Secretary Webster, he replied:

I trust the French will not take possession; but if they do, they will be dislodged, if my advice is taken, if the whole power of the Government is required to do it.

It is interesting to note the attitude of Secretary Seward in reference to the questions of reciprocity and annexation and the policy this great diplomat considered the most advantageous. In a dispatch to United States Minister McCook, at Honolulu, of September 12, 1867, he says, inter alia:

You will be governed in all your proceedings by a proper respect and courtesy to the Government and people of the Sandwich Islands; but it is proper that you should know, for your own information, that a lawful and peaceful annexation of the islands to the United States, with the consent of the people of the Sandwich Islands, is deemed desirable by this Government; and that if the policy of annexation should really conflict with the policy of reciprocity, annexation is in every case to be preferred.

The American people are indebted to the sagacity and wisdom of Mr. Seward for our extensive and valuable possessions in the Northern Pacific and arctic regions, which have in many ways been such a source of revenue, and will without doubt continue to be for a long period of time. His marvelous conception of our future as connected with the Pacific Ocean is now realized and appreciated as at no time heretofore. Secretary Fish, in correspondence with the American minister at Honolulu, in March, 1873, said:

There are also those of influence and wise foresight who see a future that must extend the jurisdictions and limits of this nation, and that will require a resting spot in midocean between the Pacific coast and the vast domains of Asia, which are now opening to commerce and Christian civilization.

Mr. Blaine in 1881 considered "the Hawaiian Islands as the key to the dominion of the American Pacific." He regarded the islands as "an outlying district of the State of California," and was a friend of annexation. He said:

The Government of the United States . . . has always avowed and now repeats that under no circumstances will it permit the transfer of the territory or sovereignty of those islands to any of the great European powers.

At that time the Government of Japan had not become one of the great powers nor an important factor to be considered in the Northern Pacific.

I have, for obvious reasons, presented at some length the views of several of our foremost statesmen upon this absorbing question. It has been undeniably the policy of our Government to prevent the absorption of these islands by any other power and their ultimate annexation. The time seems to be opportune for their admission to the Union. Will the proposed annexation be advantageous to us? The Government and people of Hawaii are now anxious for such admission, and are patiently awaiting the response of the American Congress to their appeal.

Persons familiar with the history of these people, their location, business, and commercial relations, language, education, religion, and characteristics, can readily see why they desire to relinquish their present governmental relations for membership in a stronger government, affording a more perfect union and greater security of person and property. If we refuse to annex these islands, we can not well occupy the illogical position of protesting as heretofore to their being annexed to another power, if it is the desire of the people of the islands to be so annexed. We can not with justice say: "We will not take you, nor will we permit another power to annex or dominate you." The advantages of annexation are in my judgment reciprocal.

I will briefly consider some of the advantages likely to accrue to the United States by reason of the establishment of this new relationship. An independent, weak government is in constant danger from stronger ones. The history of the Hawaiian Islands during the last eighty years is proof of this assertion. The population is mixed, and comprises about 109,000 people—24,407 Japanese and 21,616 Chinese. Less than one-half the entire population are Asiatic. This element would be considerably reduced after annexation. As a result of the changed conditions, many citizens of all classes would go from the United States to the newly acquired territory.

American business men and laborers would resort to the islands with the same enthusiasm as has marked their progress and success in other fields of activity. The resolutions forbid further Chinese immigration, and, as I understand them, they forbid those now in Hawaii from going to other parts of the United States. The Hawaiian laws exclude them from homestead rights, and the experience there as here is, as soon as they get a few hundred dollars, their longing for home takes them back.

The Portuguese constitute 15,191, and of these 7,000 are natives and speak the English language. The British population comprises 2,250, the Germans 1,432, and other Europeans about 1,000. There are 33,000 of the native Hawaiian race. There are less men of the native race than of the Japanese. The Japanese Government is demanding that her people shall have the same rights and privileges that all others have there, which includes voting and holding office. If annexation to the United States is rejected, the probability is this demand will be pressed with renewed energy by the Government, with prospect of success. With the right of suffrage secured, many thousand more Japanese would invade the islands, claim the right to vote and hold office, and thus gain the supremacy.

The American colony exceeds 8,000 souls, and they own three-fourths of the property and control the business of the islands. They have encouraged and built up the commercial trade in the interests of the United States. The American trade with these islands last year amounted to over $18,000,000. We have the greater part of the shipping business. Two hundred and forty-seven of our ships were employed in the Hawaiian trade in 1896. Much of this trade has been promoted by the reciprocity treaty between the two countries. If this treaty were abrogated by a party in power adverse to American interests, the business would largely decrease and disappear. The territory once a part of us, all danger from this source will be forever removed. In this event the whole trade would come to our country and be greatly enhanced from year to year, and all foreign complications that have unhappily harassed the people and hampered the development of the islands would be overcome. The value and importance of this trade to our people, and especially to that portion of them that reside on the Pacific coast, is incalculable.

The Hawaiians are the best customers they have—the largest consumers of their various products of any one country in the Pacific. Reference to a table of the commerce of San Francisco will surprisingly illustrate this statement. Under our present reciprocity laws we give a free market for practically only rice, sugar, and bananas. With the exception of these three products enumerated, the great resources of these fertile islands are undeveloped. The moment these islands are merged in the Republic, a free market for all products will ensue. In 1896 she had a foreign trade of over $208 per capita for every adult and child of the country—a trade unsurpassed. Thousands of acres of this productive land, formerly a barren waste, have been recently brought under cultivation by artificial irrigation. These islands can easily be made to support a population ten times greater than they now have. With an increase of population proportionate to the West Indies, the commerce of the country would speedily become of the first importance. It is difficult to estimate the enormous trade relations that will result under the benign and stimulating influences of good government, rich soil, tropical yet moderate climate, and free markets.

Serious objections have been urged against annexation on account of the ethnic character of the people. I have indicated the numbers of the various races inhabiting the country. The native Hawaiians are Polynesians, not Africans. They enjoy the same political, social, and religious liberty and equality as the white people. They readily assimilate with and take on American ways and manners. Many of them are supporters of the Republic and advocates of annexation. A majority of the present House of Representatives consists of full-blood native Hawaiians. The speaker of the House is a native.

The Chinese and Japanese are industrious and peaceable citizens, and as they are not permitted to enter into political matters or control, no danger can come to this country from so small a number. As heretofore stated, the matter of future immigration is guarded against. They are now aliens in Hawaii and not eligible to become citizens. Annexation will not enlarge their civil rights. The Portuguese are a large contingent of the population. About one-half of them are native and educated in the public schools, where the English language is taught. They are an industrious and quiet people, and are said to constitute the better laboring element there. The Americans, English, and Germans are a strong, vigorous, and potential element. They have impressed themselves, their forms of government, laws, customs, and manners, upon the larger population. They have acquired ownership over most of the property and control the bulk of the business transacted in the islands. If they have accomplished so much under the unfavorable monarchical government, it is not unreasonable to expect greater things under a republican form of government.

In contemplating the history of annexation of territory in the United States, from the Louisiana purchase to the present, we have never had a larger contingent of Anglo-Saxons than live in Hawaii. When Florida was annexed she had a population of a few Spaniards and Indians. Texas at one time had a population solely of Mexicans, Spaniards, and Indians. In ten years from the date of annexation, I venture the prediction that the foreign element in Hawaii will not be any more noticeable nor objectionable than the same element in many of the States of the Union is at this time.

It is a pleasing subject, and one in which our friends upon the other side of the Chamber often indulge. The danger consequent upon a mixture of the races and blending of foreign customs and habits is more fancied than real. The stronger races always have and always will dominate the weaker. This doctrine has never been more forcibly illustrated than in the recent history of the people of these islands. A handful of heroic Americans have overthrown the monarchy, grown hoary with age, and established upon its ruins a Republic fashioned after our own, with a constitution that gives the subjects the utmost freedom consistent with adequate protection.

They enjoy legislative, executive, and judicial departments of government along the lines guaranteed by the American Constitution. Many of their statutes are copies of those enacted in the United States, and legal documents are modeled after our own. Most of the lawyers and judges are either from the United States or educated there. The public-school system is largely a transcript from that of the States of the Union. There are 187 schools, taught by 436 teachers, and containing 12,600 pupils, all taught in the English language. A majority of the teachers are Americans. The English language is the one that obtains in the schools, courts, and business circles.

The money of the United States is the current money there, and all bonds, notes, and mortgages are made payable in United States money. There are no paupers or tramps in the islands, and no poorhouses are required. The American holidays are enthusiastically observed as here. Have any of our people residing in territories heretofore annexed had such a training and preparation for American citizenship as have the people of Hawaii? She is not wanted as a State, to swell the membership in the upper House of Congress. She does not ask it, nor do we concede it. The treaty provides that she shall come in as a Territory, and her government will be left entirely in the hands of Congress.

It has been erroneously urged by opponents of annexation that annexation will be ruinous to the beet-sugar culture of the United States. Let us examine into this favorite argument and ascertain the true situation. If the Hawaiian product can be produced in such large quantities so as to displace the American beet product, or by reducing the price and lowering it to the producers, and thus make the cultivation of it unprofitable, then there may be some force in their argument.

The sugar territory of these islands has been increased until there are no lands remaining except a limited amount of barren lands that can only be utilized by expensive artificial irrigation. Hawaii can never produce sugar enough to supplant the beet-sugar culture or any other sugar culture in the United States. During the year 1896 she produced a little over 200,000 tons, or about one-tenth of the consumption of the United States. This is the largest output after years of successful production.

Sugar is a world's product, and the price is determined by the world's price, which is fixed in London and New York. A considerable portion of this product is sent to New York. If the sugar product of Hawaii were doubled, the world's supply would be so imperceptibly increased that the price would not be affected. A total failure of the crop would not change the price fixed as above stated. The difference in expense of growing cane sugar in Hawaii and beet sugar in the United States is decidedly in favor of the latter. The time required for growing a crop of the former is more than twice as long as that of the latter.

There can be, however, no reason why the interests of the cane grower and beet grower should clash. There is an ample market at good prices for all. It has been urged that annexation will increase our foreign complications. No foreign power except Japan has protested against it, and her objections have been substantially overcome. Most of our leading statesmen for the past fifty years, as shown by liberal quotations made from their utterances upon this subject, have emphasized the importance of acquiring these islands, and they agree that at some time we must annex them.

When will a time come when we can accomplish the long-desired result with so little expense and friction? The interests of Japan and the other great powers in the Pacific will continue to increase, and their hostility to annexation may be aroused at any time. There is danger in delay. But if immediate action is taken little apprehension is to be felt from foreign complications. A weak, isolated country is a continuing temptation to powerful nations. Once an integral part of the United States, the temptation is removed and the danger gone.

I proceed now to a discussion of what is regarded as the most important question—the necessity of annexation from a strategic standpoint. The proximity to the Pacific coast is such that our Government has at all times protested against occupation by other powers. Honolulu, the capital of these islands, is located in a southwesterly direction from San Francisco, a distance of about 2,100 miles. It is the principal town and port in this group of eight islands. The annexation of the islands is in accord with the Monroe doctrine, which excludes European powers from interfering in the American continent and outlying islands, but does not limit or abridge the United States.

The possession of Hawaii is necessary to the protection of the Pacific States. No nation, European or Asiatic, excepting Great Britain, possesses a coaling station near enough to the Pacific coast to be advantageous as a base of hostile naval operations against the coast or its commerce. The President and Congress would be grossly derelict in duty if they permitted a foreign power to seize these islands or establish a protectorate over them. Such occupancy would be, from a commercial standpoint, most injurious to our interests and result in the loss of trade established after so many years of patient labor and foresight.

The testimony given by General Schofield and Admiral Walker before the Committee on Foreign Affairs last May clearly and conclusively demonstrates the great importance of Pearl Harbor and Honolulu as bases of naval and military operations. Speaking of Pearl Harbor, General Schofield says:

Its natural adaptability to naval purposes is perhaps not surpassed by any harbor in the world in regard to its secure anchorage for large fleets, its distance from the sea, beyond the reach of guns of war ships, and the great ease with which the entrance to the harbor could be defended by batteries so as to make it a perfectly safe refuge for merchant shipping or naval cruisers, or even a fleet that might find it necessary to take refuge there; for coaling grounds, for navy-yard repair shops, storehouses, and everything of that kind.

He further says:

The most important feature of all is that it economizes the naval force rather than increases it. It is capable of absolute defense by shore batteries, so that a naval fleet, after going there and replenishing its supplies and making what repairs are needed, can go away and leave the harbor perfectly safe under the protection of the Army.

Under the treaty with Hawaii the United States enjoys certain rights and privileges in this harbor—the right to hold and use, fortify and improve—but thus far has not to any extent exercised the rights conceded. The land for miles about the harbor should be owned by the Government before any large expenditure of money would be justified in dredging the channels and fortifying the approaches. The right to annul this reciprocity treaty is reserved by either party thereto giving the other one year's notice of intention so to do. So it is evident under provision of this treaty the Government of the United States has not deemed it wise to open and improve the harbor.

The control of these islands and this superb natural harbor will insure the key to the North Pacific Ocean. These islands are on the route from the prominent ports of the Pacific States to the important cities of Asia, many of the islands of the Pacific, and Australasia. The commerce of the Pacific is in its infancy. It is the great theater for future commercial expansion and development of trade relations between the Old and New worlds. In 1851 Admiral Dupont made report to the Navy Department "upon the condition and requirements of the coast defenses of the United States." He said:

It is impossible to estimate too highly the value and importance of the Sandwich Islands, whether in a commercial or military point of view. Should circumstances ever place them in our hands they would prove the most important acquisition we could make in the whole Pacific Ocean—an acquisition intimately connected with our commercial and naval supremacy in these seas.

This distinguished officer of our Navy is prophetic in the language used concerning these islands, our trade relations with them, and our naval supremacy in the waters of the Orient. It would seem that nature established this archipelago by some great upheaval, and that they have been reserved as an outpost in the Pacific to guide and sustain our naval ships of war and transports on the mission of help and succor to our gallant men that so heroically upheld our "naval supremacy in these seas," and as a result of their valor subdued and acquired the Philippine Islands, and present them as a ransom for the life and treasure expended in prosecuting the war.

A strange coincidence secures to the great Republic these twin pearls of the Pacific. The one the happening and culmination of events covering a period of fifty years. The other the result of a glorious victory of our Navy, consuming but a few hours, in a war prosecuted for humanity's sake, with no thought of conquest or extension of territory. It is proverbial that the accidents of war are manifold. Our recent experience in the waters of the Orient is a striking illustration of this adage. The disability or destruction of the enemy's navy in the remote harbor of Manila was deemed an essential incident in the progress of the war.

The task assigned our gallant commander was so brilliantly conceived and promptly executed that one morning, a few weeks since, the American people awakened to a realization of the fact that our incomparable Navy had fought the most signal naval battle in the history of the world. As the unexpected result of this great victory, a group of the richest islands in the Pacific, and without doubt the most productive in all the seas, has fallen into the possession of the United States, like ripened fruit from an overburdened tree. Now that our heroic men have braved the terrors of mines, shot and shell, and accomplished such a victory, are we who remain at home in ease and comfort to be indifferent to their sacrifices and great results?

The fulfillment of the destiny of this great Republic comprehends a policy of territorial and commercial expansion. An unexampled opportunity is presented for advancement along these lines, recognized and pursued by the great nations of the earth. If we are to profit by their experience, we will not hesitate to pass these resolutions. If the Philippines are to be retained as compensatory damages for loss of life and treasure in the present war, then Hawaii as a port of call is indispensable to the Government that is to own and control the former. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. DAVIDSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the subject under discussion, the annexation of Hawaii, is not a new one. For fifty years it has been before our people in one form or another, and during this time the leading statesmen and the best military and naval authorities of our country have expressed themselves in favor of the proposition.

In 1853 Secretary of State Marcy said:

It seems to be inevitable that they [the Sandwich Islands] must come under the control of this Government.

Prior to that time Webster, Buchanan, and Clayton had each expressed similar sentiments, while in later years Seward, Fish, and Blaine were of the same opinion. President Harrison was strongly in favor of annexation, and there is no question concerning the views of our present Chief Magistrate on this subject.

Captain Mahan, the well-known authority in naval affairs, says:

From a military point of view, the possession of Hawaii will strengthen the United States. It is not practicable for any trans-Pacific country to invest our Pacific coast without first occupying Hawaii as a base.

Chief Engineer Melville, of the Navy, says:

Pearl Harbor is the sole key to the full defense of our western shore, and that key should lie in our grasp only.

Admiral Dupont said:

It is impossible to estimate too highly the value and importance of the Sandwich Islands, whether in a commercial or military point of view. Should circumstances ever place them in our hands, they would prove the most important acquisition we could make in the whole Pacific Ocean, an acquisition intimately connected with our commercial and naval supremacy in these seas.

General Schofield, of the Army, says:

It constitutes the only natural outpost to the defenses on the Pacific coast. I have likened that harbor to a commanding position in front of a defensive line which an army in the field is compelled to occupy. The army must occupy that advanced position and hold it at whatever cost, or else the enemy will occupy it with his artillery and thus dominate the main line. If we do not occupy Pearl Harbor, our enemy will occupy it as a base from which to conduct operations against our Pacific coast. One of the greatest advantages of Pearl Harbor to us consists in the fact that no navy would be required to defend it. It is a deep, land-locked arm of the sea, easily defended by fortifications placed near its entrance, with its anchorage beyond the reach of guns from the ocean. The value of such a place of refuge and supplies for merchant marine and cruisers in time of war can hardly be overestimated, yet the greatest value to us of that wonderful harbor consists in the fact that its possession and adequate defense by us prevents the possibility of any enemy using it against us.

The logic of these statements is apparent when we remember that there is in the Pacific Ocean, from the equator to Alaska and from the coasts of China and Japan to the American continent, but one place where a passing vessel can obtain supplies or enter for repairs, and that place is Hawaii.

The expressions which I have quoted were made not when we were in the midst of a conflict with a foreign nation, but in a time of peace, when these eminent naval and military authorities and patriotic statesmen were looking to the perfection of our national defense, at which time they realized the importance of these islands as a strategic point from which the whole Pacific coast could be controlled.

The events of the last few weeks have demonstrated the wisdom of their judgment and shown the necessity of our having control of these islands.

No ship has yet been constructed which can cross the Pacific Ocean and engage in actual combat and still be in a position to return to its original port for supplies. No hostile fleet can possibly menace our Pacific coast without first obtaining control of Pearl Harbor, and we have found that the converse of this proposition is true—that it is impossible for us to send a fleet to the relief of Dewey at Manila, 7,000 miles from San Francisco, without having some place midway in that broad waste of waters where our vessels can enter for supplies and repairs and where our soldiers being thus transported may be permitted to land and be refreshed.

Through the kindness of the people of that little Republic our soldiers have been granted this privilege, and our vessels have been able to make use of this harbor.

That this is in violation of the laws of neutrality may be conceded, but there is a law higher than that of nations; it is the law of humanity, the law of God.

It is the observance of this higher law which has prompted the people of that Republic to jeopardize their own interests and endanger even the very existence of their Government in order that a favor might be extended to us.

In our present difficulty with Spain the Republic of Hawaii stands alone, a single exception among the nations of the earth, the only one that has extended a helping hand to us. And why is this? Because for years the people of those islands were crushed beneath the despotism of a rotten kingdom, but now they are enjoying the blessings of freedom, and they appreciate, as do not the crowned kingdoms of the earth, how high and noble is our purpose in this war with Spain. They see in the Stars and Stripes a harbinger of freedom, a refuge and strength to suffering humanity, and they gladly bid us enter.

You who fail to see the necessity of the annexation of those islands at this time think what might have been the result had Dewey's attack at Manila resulted disastrously, and he been compelled to turn back and traverse a distance of 7,000 miles before he could reach a harbor for repairs or for supplies. Had such been the result, instead of having a fleet, the pride of our nation, floating so majestically and victoriously in the harbor of Manila, those ships would ere this have been but broken hulks, dead, deserted derelicts, drifting aimlessly in that broad sea.

The principal argument of the gentlemen who are opposed to this proposition is that it is unconstitutional. There are certain gentlemen in this Chamber before whose eyes the Constitution ever stands an impassable barrier to everything which looks to the advancement of civilization or to the progress of our country.

Some of these gentlemen years ago failed to understand aright the terms of the Constitution, and it seems the passing years have not added wisdom to their understanding. Sufficient answer to the objection is that the same question has been raised five times during our national history. It has been brought forward every time a proposition for the acquisition of territory has been presented and as often has it been passed upon and overruled, so that it now has no standing in court.

The people and the Government of Hawaii have offered these islands to us. To accept their offer will not take from the Treasury of the United States one dollar nor from the American people one drop of blood. Failing to accept their offer, we are forever estopped from objecting if a like offer should at some future time be made to and accepted by some other nation.

We can not be heard to say that we will not annex these islands ourselves and in the same breath that we will not permit any other nation to annex them.

It is well known that within a century these islands have at four different times been possessed by other nations, and their present independence has only been attained after a heroic struggle. The future stability of this little Republic is uncertain. Standing alone, without wealth, without population, it can hardly hold its own against more powerful nations, and should we fail to control or protect it, it will undoubtedly soon be acquired, peacefully or otherwise, by some of the great powers.

I am opposed to maintaining a protectorate over any country. Our nation should never assume the responsibilities of another nation except under such conditions as will enable us to dictate the laws of that nation and compel their observance.

I do not profess to be versed in military affairs. Whether the annexation of these islands is a military necessity at this time is a question, however, upon which I am willing to accept the opinion of military authorities, and when we know that not only the best military authorities have expressed themselves in favor of annexation, but that our present Chief Magistrate believes that in order to successfully prosecute the present war it is necessary to secure these islands as a base of supplies, I for one am prepared to accept their judgment and vote accordingly.

I propose to support the President in everything which he believes is necessary for the successful prosecution of this war, and I know that in so doing I represent the united sentiment of the people of my district.

This question of annexation has for fifty years been an open and debatable one; but it seems to me that when Admiral Dewey's guns awoke the echoes in Manila Harbor on the morning of the 1st of May, they "moved the previous question" upon this proposition, and from that time debate has not been in order.

Prior to that date our people undoubtedly were divided upon this proposition, but I believe they are no longer divided. They realize the necessity of the acquisition of these islands at the present time, in order that the boys who have gone from your town and from mine, from every hamlet over this broad land, to defend the honor and the integrity of the nation and to bring relief to suffering humanity may find within that broad expanse of water some place where their feet may touch mother earth, where they can breathe the pure air, and where the vessels bearing them may be supplied with coal and bread and water, to the end that their expedition may result successfully and to the honor of the American people.

But there is another reason why these resolutions should be adopted. Year after year there has come to us from across the seas rumors of trouble in those Eastern countries. Year after year there have been indications that the great powers might become involved in a war over their Eastern possessions. Japan, which lately surprised the world by its defeat of China, is one of the coming nations of the world, and with its magnificent navy and with the energy and progress of its citizens it will soon become a strong competitor of England, of Russia, and of Germany.

China as a nation has been dead for years. It has not kept pace with the advancement of the nations around it. It may revive and progress. Failing to do this, however, this great Empire will soon be a thing of the past. Its territory will be divided among the great powers, each portion being subject in all its trade relations to the power which controls it.

Ours is a nation of peace and progression. Its broad acres are now all under cultivation. Its cities are black with the smoke of furnaces, its workmen busily employed in the manufacture of every article capable of construction. To continue this condition of things our people, our manufacturers, our farmers must seek a foreign market. If we are to furnish employment for the brain and brawn and muscle of our mechanics, we must find a market for the wares they construct. If those engaged in agricultural pursuits are to prosper, a market must be found for their surplus grain.

The Latin-American countries and the great Eastern countries offer the best opportunities for acquiring such a market. Our competitors will be England, Germany, Austria, and Russia. To successfully compete with them we must take advantage of every opportunity which offers. Within the next few years our people will awake to the necessity of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal and its control by this Government. That canal, when completed, will become the gateway through which will pass the commerce of the world. Then Cuba and Puerto Rico will stand as sentinels guarding its eastern approach, while on the west will be the impregnable fortress of Pearl Harbor, a strong factor in shaping and controlling the commerce of the Western Continent. Being a part of our possessions, Hawaii's trade will be entirely subject to our control. Not only this, but every vessel passing in either direction across the Pacific must touch at this point before reaching its destination.

With these islands under our control, our trade relations will be established and our commercial interests in the East forever protected.

It can not be said that the policy of our nation has been one of territorial acquisition. We have not aspired to the attainment of colonial possessions. The islands of the seas have not been to us prizes toward which we have looked with longing eyes, but we have, from time to time, acquired such territory as seemed to be necessary for the best interests of our nation; and should these resolutions prevail and Hawaii be annexed, it does not necessarily follow, nor is it possible, that such action will have any influence upon the future. It stands a single and independent proposition, to be determined upon its merits and in such a manner as will be for the best interests of our country.

Some gentlemen are loath in their declarations that the war in which we are engaged has now become one of conquest and that the policy of our nation from now will be one of territorial acquisition. These statements have been made with reckless disregard for accuracy and truth, and there is absolutely nothing to substantiate them. The possession of the Philippines, the possession of Puerto Rico, the possession of Cuba, yea, even the possession of Madrid itself, if these should finally be possessed by American armies, will be but incidents of a war commenced for the cause of humanity and prosecuted only for that purpose.

A war can not be successfully prosecuted and every movement confined to the immediate scene of action. In order that this war may be successfully waged, the power of the enemy must be weakened and destroyed. Her fleets must be driven from the seas, her forts must be destroyed, her armies captured, her territory acquired. These are the lines along which the war must be waged, and these are the lines along which the present Administration will prosecute, vigorously and effectively, the present war until the Kingdom of Spain is ready to cry, "Hold, enough!"

The question as to what will be done with the territory acquired by our armies during the present war is no part of the subject now under discussion. The disposition of all such territory will be determined when the war is over. The Philippines are now, or soon will be, entirely under the control of the American Army. The flag of freedom, the Stars and Stripes, will float where once floated the red and yellow of the Spanish Kingdom. Whether the Stars and Stripes shall come down and the flag of despotism, of tyranny, and of treachery be again restored is a question which can safely be left to the American people for disposition at the proper time, without fear but what it will be settled right—right in the eyes of humanity, right in the eyes of God.

The gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber need have no fear of the future of this Republic. It is safe in the hands of the people, safe in the hands of those chosen by the people to administer its affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the adoption of these resolutions. Aside from the question of their commercial importance, it is sufficient that the acquisition of these islands at this time is a war necessity. This being true, I believe we should acquire them.

Our hearts, our hopes are with the boys who have gone to the front, and, whether their destiny be Cuba, Puerto Rico, or Manila, our every action should be for their best interests. Let us not hesitate, let us not put aside this opportunity of establishing a base of supplies midway between our own coast and the future battlefield whereon our soldiers will soon be engaged in actual conflict—a battlefield a portion of which will undoubtedly become for all time a sacred spot to which the longing eyes of many a mother will turn as she remembers that in that far distant land her son lies sleeping, his life given for the cause of humanity and for the preservation of his nation's honor. [Applause.]

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, to one who respects the wisdom of his forefathers, who rejoices in Americanism, and who regards with love and hope those who are to live after us, this question of annexation is of great interest. A great duty is upon this Congress, to settle it, not in accord with the wishes of Hawaii, but in accord with the best interests of our own people. There is no rule or principle that requires us to annex any territory because the people of that territory desire it. Our Government is for our people, and in its conduct our people should be considered.

I shall briefly discuss the situation. As I did not think our policy in the past was correctly stated by the advocates of annexation, I have quite thoroughly investigated it; and in order that it may now be understood, I shall read a few extracts which I have culled from our public history.

Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, in 1843, wrote that it was the sense of the Government of the United States regarding these islands—

That no power ought either to take possession of the islands as a conquest or for the purpose of colonization, and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing Government, or any exclusive privileges or preferences with it in matters of commerce.

President Tyler, in a message to Congress, in December, 1842, said of these islands:

Considering therefore that the United States possess so very large a share in the intercourse with those islands, it is deemed not unfit to make the declaration that this Government seeks nevertheless no peculiar advantages, no exclusive control over the Hawaiian Government, but is content with its independent existence, and anxiously wishes for its security and prosperity.

Mr. Clayton, as Secretary of State in 1850, wrote to Mr. Rives, our minister to France, in regard to these islands:

We do not ourselves covet sovereignty over them.

Mr. Webster again, as Secretary of State in 1851, wrote to Mr. Severance:

This Government still desires to see the nationality of the Hawaiian Government maintained, its independent administration of public affairs respected, and its prosperity and reputation increased.

Mr. Marcy, as Secretary of State in 1853, wrote of these islands:

While we do not intend to attempt the exercise of any exclusive control over them, we are resolved that no other power or state shall exact any political or commercial privileges from them which we are not permitted to enjoy, far less to establish any protectorate over them.

Two years afterwards Mr. Marcy was willing to annex them.

Mr. Fish, as Secretary of State under President Grant in 1873, wrote in reference to these islands:

The acquisition of territory beyond the sea, outside the present confines of the United States, meets the opposition of many discreet men who have more or less influence in our councils.

Mr. Blaine, as Secretary of State in 1881, of these islands wrote:

I view that sentiment [American sentiment at Honolulu] as the logical recognition of the needs of Hawaii as a member of the American system of States rather than as a blind desire for a protectorate or ultimate annexation to the American Union.

This Government has on previous occasions been brought face to face with the question of a protectorate over the Hawaiian group. It has as often as it arose been set aside in the interest of such commercial union and such reciprocity of benefits as would give to Hawaii the highest advantages and at the same time strengthen its independent existence as a sovereign State. In this I have summed up the whole disposition of the United States toward Hawaii in its present condition.

The policy of this country with regard to the Pacific is the natural complement to its Atlantic policy. The history of our European relations for fifty years shows the jealous concern with which the United States has guarded its control of the coast from foreign interference, and this without extension of territorial possession beyond the mainland.

Such, Mr. Speaker, has been the policy, not of any particular political party, but of our country toward Hawaii, in its beginning disclaiming the desire of exclusive control, always declaring that no other country should control them, and that their independent condition was desired. It is conceded that the people of those islands are more intelligent, more experienced, wealthier, and more capable of an independent government now than heretofore, yet I do not deny that we have had eminent statesmen who advocated our acquisition of those islands. But let me cite some additional authority upon the principle involved. Mr. Frelinghuysen, as Secretary of State under President Arthur in 1883, wrote:

The policy of this Government, as declared on many occasions in the past, has tended toward avoidance of possessions disconnected from the main continent. Had the tendency of the United States been to extend territorial dominion beyond intervening seas, opportunities have not been wanting to effect such a purpose, whether on the coast of Africa, in the West Indies, or in the South Pacific.

Again in 1884 he wrote:

A conviction that a fixed policy, dating back to the origin of our constitutional Government, was considered to make it inexpedient to attempt territorial aggrandizement which would require maintenance by a naval force in excess of any yet provided for our national uses has led this Government to decline territorial acquisitions. Even as simple coaling stations, such territorial acquisitions would involve responsibility beyond their utility. The United States have never deemed it needful to their national life to maintain impregnable fortresses along the world's highways of commerce.

Mr. Bayard, as Secretary of State, in 1885 wrote:

The policy of the United States declared and pursued for more than a century discontinuances and in practice forbids distant colonial acquisitions.

In 1885 President Cleveland, in his first annual message, used this language:

Maintaining as I do the tenets of a line of precedents from Washington's day, which prescribe entangling alliances with foreign states, I do not favor a policy of acquisition of new and distant territory or the incorporation of remote interests with our own.

Mr. Jefferson, who always desired and expected Cuba to some day be ours, wrote to President Madison in 1809 relative to Cuba:

It will be objected to our receiving Cuba, that no limit can then be drawn to our future acquisitions. Cuba can be defended by us without a navy, and this develops the principle which ought to limit our views. Nothing should ever be accepted which would require a navy to defend it.

Mr. Speaker, we acquired the Louisiana country, Florida, Texas, and the California country without violating this principle. Acting upon that principle, we have often refused territory. In 1848, when Mr. Polk was President, Yucatan offered "to transfer the dominion and sovereignty of the peninsula to the United States." The offer was not accepted. During President Grant's Administration Santo Domingo offered annexation to the United States. General Grant earnestly urged its acceptance, but the treaty was rejected by the Senate.

During President Johnson's Administration Denmark offered us the Islands of St. Thomas and St. John for $7,500,000. The Administration, through Secretary Seward, negotiated the treaty. It went to the Senate. There was an adverse report on it, and the matter was dropped.

But, Mr. Speaker, the spirit of annexation, with a contempt for our past conservative policy, exclaims that a new era is upon us. Annexationists exclaim that we must have the Philippine Islands, the Canaries, Cuba, and Puerto Rico, and wherever we can place our flag there it must go. The jingo press takes up the cry and denounces those who stand where Webster, where Blaine, where Jefferson stood upon this question of territorial acquisition. They exclaim that we annexed Texas, Louisiana, Florida, and California. Yes; but we annexed pillars of strength and empires of possibilities, and not a burdensome and unnecessary subject for strife and complications. They were a part of our mainland, requiring no great navy to defend. But what and where are the Sandwich or Hawaiian Islands which the Administration so anxiously desires to become a part of our country? We should understand what we are annexing, for if once annexed they will never be divorced from us. Usually bad laws can be repealed, but bad unions usually last.

These islands are in the Pacific Ocean, 2,100 miles from our coast. Start in London, cross the English Channel, cross Belgium, cross the German Empire, cross the Austrian Empire, cross Turkey, and stand in the palace of the Sultan; even more, transform the map and in that journey also cross the great Republic of France, and you have not traveled so far as from San Francisco to Honolulu, the capital of these islands, and yet gentlemen speak of their proximity as an argument for annexation.

There are eight principal islands, with many small ones, altogether containing about 6,000 square miles—but a little larger than the district which I have the honor to represent. About one-half of that area is uninhabitable. Their population is 109,000, composed of 40,000 natives, called Kanakas, 25,000 Japanese, 23,000 Chinese, 15,000 Portuguese, 3,000 Americans, and 4,000 British and Germans. Less than 3 per cent of the people there are Americans. It is an undesirable population—not bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. There are many lepers on the islands. Our laws exclude Chinese from our shores, and yet you would incorporate at one swoop 23,000 Chinese with us.

We tell you annexation violates American doctrines, and you shout your admiration for the policy of England, Germany, and Russia. You want a coaling station there, and there is not a coal mine in 2,200 miles of those islands. You want a harbor there, when we already have Pearl Harbor, the finest in the islands, and have had it for twenty years by treaty. You want them as a half-way place to Japan, when we have a route to Japan by way of the Aleutian Islands, a part of our Alaska Territory, 800 miles nearer to Japan than by way of the Hawaiian Islands. Kiska, one of the Aleutian Islands on this route, with a fine harbor and a line of steamers running regularly, is 1,300 miles nearer than Honolulu to Japan. You say it is wrong for us not to take them and then not allow another country to take them, yet that has always been our position, and it is our position in regard to Brazil, Patagonia, and every other country in this hemisphere. We want them to be independent. You want a fortification there; then fortify what we now have, Pearl Harbor.

If you want to do so, make it impregnable, but do not annex that mixed population to us, do not enter upon a policy of imperial colonization without hearing from the people about it. You have not heard from them. The great metropolitan press is a mighty power for good when it is right, but also a mighty power for evil when it is wrong, as it has been when advocating the gold standard and annexation. Annexationists want to see our country enlarge its area. Remember all increase is not muscle; it may be useless, surplus fat. Even more, it may be a deadly growth. Our country now is like a trained athlete—bone and sinew—compact, closely knit together, full of vitality, and free from easily vulnerable spots. Add islands in the far Pacific, and we attach a vulnerable position. We must then dissipate our power, and monarchic tyranny and corruption begin to course through our political veins.

We remind you of labor conditions on those islands, and you reply that the United States must regulate the hours of labor wherever our flag waves. On many occasions in this Congress have we witnessed your growing determination to interfere with the hours of labor in the several States by act of Congress and amendment of the Constitution, but you can not succeed.

We remind you that annexation of territory beyond the seas will necessitate a large army and navy, and you defiantly reply that we must have the best navy that floats on the sea. In some respects a standing army of a million men would be admirable, but its dangers and its expense would vastly outweigh its benefits.

The greatest navy afloat would be admirable, but it is not necessary and its burdens upon the people and its danger would vastly outweigh its benefits. Thus with annexation it may have benefits, but it has greater burdens, responsibilities, and tendencies to evil. I would have a good navy, capable of protecting our interests. Unlike the monarchies of Europe, we have no thousands of islands scattered over the world to protect, we have no colonies to rob and oppress, we are not seeking new nations to place under the bonds of tyranny for the sake of greed. But you say military and naval men want a large army and a mighty navy. They see only the Army and the Navy. They see only one side of the public Treasury. The side that pours out money to build armies and navies. We should see the other side, as that money goes into the Treasury from the hard earnings of our people.

The Army and Navy are for the country, not the country for the Army and Navy. England, France, Germany, and Russia are like duellists with left hands linked together, and in their right hands they must carry gigantic navies and armies; but oceans roll between us and our enemy in any war. When Spain, at the end of the present war, gets off of this continent, what will remain upon which to base a reasonable fear of war? Nothing but the jingo spirit which may lead us into "entangling alliances."

To increase and maintain our Navy equal to England's constantly increasing navy would require at least $100,000,000 annually which the taxpayers of our country would have to pay. If gentlemen had more consideration for those who have to bear all the costs of navies, they would not declaim so loudly for the mightiest navy in the world. A moderate, well-equipped, well-manned, effective navy is all that our needs require. The very fact that distant territorial possessions would require an enormous navy should prevent them.

Again, while annexation would benefit the holders of the $4,000,000 of Hawaiian bonds, and probably save the present Government there from overthrow, it is well understood that a majority of the people of the islands are opposed to annexation, and, in my opinion, a majority of the American people are opposed to annexation. I understand that a short time ago a great many Republicans in this House were against it, but the Administration has favored it, and many of them have reversed their positions to be in line with the President.

Our Revolutionary war was fought to break the colonial grasp of England. The present war was begun, according to the theory of the Administration, to break the colonial grasp of Spain on Cuba, and the resolutions which passed Congress expressly disclaimed any intention of obtaining sovereignty over Cuba. How inconsistent is it now for us during this war to fasten our colonial rasp upon Cuba, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines! And yet annexationists boldly announce that such shall be our policy. The whole spirit of our institutions repels distant colonization.

If there is any one principle greater than another that inspired the authors of the Declaration of Independence, it was that of local sovereignty of States; it was home rule; it was hostility to rule from abroad. Annexation of distant islands will violate this principle of local independent self-government. To bring the world under one political rule has been the dream of tyrants, not of lovers of humanity. Liberty loves independent states. How would we govern the Philippines? Would their 10,000,000 of people, nearly all of an inferior race, send to this Congress fifty Representatives in the House and several Senators? Or would we rule them as monarchies rule their colonies?

Not a single advocate of annexation of Hawaii has suggested what manner of government we would give them. If it were known that annexation would stop with Hawaii, and that no other far-distant lands were now or hereafter to be annexed, there would not be so much danger in the pending resolutions. But most of those who advocate them boldly proclaim that we should adopt the colonization policy that characterizes European powers. Why should we abandon the wise and safe policy of Washington and Jefferson? Why should we abandon our great mission of encouraging the establishment of free states in the world and sow the seeds that shall perhaps destroy democratic government from the earth? We want no colonies for robbery. We need no colonies for protection. A nation should be large enough to be strong, but small enough to be just; strong to resist any aggressor, just to every citizen. Our country is large enough, and we are the mightiest nation on earth. I hope that we may some time be the most just to every citizen.

Ineloquence gentlemen have exclaimed that they live not in the past, that new conditions have arisen, that Dewey's victory at Manila broke to pieces our past policy and ushered into our national life a different one. It is talked that we must help decide the "Eastern problem" and have a say in taking territory from poor old China. It is talked among Republican members, as I understand, that new issues are being made for political parties; that the financial issue will be superseded; that the Republican party, on account of the war and annexation, will get a new lease of power. I do not wish to comment upon all this talk, but if Dewey's great victory at Manila should result in our country's abandonment of its great principles which have safely guided her for more than a hundred years, and in their stead the adoption of the policy of the crowned heads of Europe—the policy of territorial aggrandizement and colonial oppression—though we to-day shout the praises of that victory from patriotic hearts, yet our posterity will curse it as the beginning of the destruction of individual liberty, political justice, and independent government from the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON], but inasmuch as that will extend the time beyond the hour of 10.30 o'clock, the hour fixed for adjournment, I ask unanimous consent to postpone the hour of adjournment to 11 o'clock, as my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] desires to yield the remainder of the half hour to a gentleman on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAFF). Unanimous consent is asked to postpone the hour of adjournment until 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON].

[Mr. GIBSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the project advanced by the pending resolution it is evident that we are not occupied with the benefits that are to accrue to the people of Hawaii, but our concern is how our people are to be affected. I take this to be the sole question at issue with us. I shall make no attempt to convince those who in this or any other matter of public import assume the position that the policy of our Government should seek to benefit any people save our own. Those who argue that we should annex Hawaii because it will result beneficially to the people of the islands will not be heard patiently by me, nor shall I stoop to argue the matter with them. The advantage or disadvantage to them is a question of supreme indifference to me. Let them look to their own interests.

The greatest good to the greatest number of the American people should be the inexorable rule of every American, in or out of Congress, in the solution of all public problems.

I therefore lay down the proposition as self-evident that it is not only our right but our highest duty to consider no other but our own interests in discussing this project.

Accepting this as the true criterion by which we are to be guided in considering this resolution, it necessarily follows that with those who advocate annexation rests the burden of proving that we shall be benefited by annexation.

But before entering into a discussion of the advantages or disadvantages to accrue to us through annexation, I desire to emphasize the fact that, in my opinion, the House is without power to pass upon this question in the shape presented.

Generally speaking, a nation may acquire territory by conquest, by purchase, or by discovery. The framers of our Constitution laid down the rule of action, however, that we may, apart from the modus operandi just mentioned, acquire territory by treaty. Under this provision Jefferson negotiated the purchase of Louisiana and the Northwest from France in 1803. Under President Monroe, in 1819, in the same way we acquired Florida from Spain, and during the Presidency of Mr. Johnson, in 1870, Alaska was ceded to us by Russia. Upper California, including what is now California, Nevada, Utah, Wyoming, New Mexico, and Arizona, we acquired in 1848, under Mr. Polk's Administration, as a result of our war with Mexico. Our title to this latter territory is by force of conquest.

We purchased Alaska from Russia in 1867. The title was conveyed by treaty. The only other territory acquired by us was Texas, in 1845, under President Tyler's Administration. Texas, an independent republic, was admitted into the Union as a new State. It was never annexed in the true sense of the word, nor can it be quoted as a precedent for this "scheme," for it is not here sought to admit Hawaii into the Union as a new State. Nowhere in the Constitution do I find authority vested in this House to acquire territory, except to admit new States into the Union, and then this authority is exercised conjunctively with the Senate.

The Senate alone is vested with power to ratify or reject treaties having for their purpose acquisition of territory. The territory of Upper California, then, was obtained by conquest; Louisiana, Florida, and Alaska were acquired under the treaty-making power, and Texas was admitted into the Union under the express power given Congress to admit new States. But I shall not further deal with this phase of the question. Able men have long since settled it in the debate that led to the admission of Texas into the Union.

But lest, in their greed to acquire foreign territory, the advocates of annexation should, by brute force, brush aside this constitutional plea, as they evidently propose to do, I shall return to a discussion of the merits of the controversy.

I can conceive of but three ways that we can be benefited by the acquisition of any territory—that is, from a commercial standpoint, or from a military standpoint, or from a political standpoint.

Now, in annexing Hawaii, shall we be benefited in a commercial way? Let us see.

Since 1875 our Government has been in commercial treaty with Hawaii. Our trade relations with her under the treaty make absolutely certain the benefits or disadvantages which must follow annexation. Under the treaty the products of the islands are placed on our markets free of duty, while in return the duties of many of the manufactured articles of the United States are remitted to us. Our present trade relations with Hawaii, therefore, are exactly what they will be after annexation, if we commit the blunder of annexing. Now, have we lost or gained by this exchange of commodities under the treaty?

I here attach a comparative statement of our export and import trade with Hawaii:

A mere glance at these figures shows that for every dollar's worth of merchandise that we have been permitted to place upon the Hawaiian market without paying duty to the Hawaiian Government the people of the islands have been allowed to use our markets free of duty for from two to three dollars' worth of their goods.

In other words, for every dollar's worth of advantage we have secured from them under the treaty we have paid them from two to three dollars; and in doing this we have placed American toil, in field and factory, in direct competition with the cheap contract labor of Hawaii.

Strange to say, this "scheme" finds its greatest supporters on the other side of this Chamber, where men most prize the protection of American labor. It appears, too, from these statistics that a large percentage of the goods exported by us to Hawaii is of foreign manufacture, so that American laborers are greater sufferers from the treaty than at first is apparent.

To adopt this resolution would be to perpetuate these conditions and to continue the competition between American and Asiatic labor, not in the markets of the world, but to invite the competition at home on an equal footing with us.

Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to represent the greatest sugar-producing district in the United States. Rice within the last few years has become a staple product in my district.

These two articles are practically the only products raised for exportation in the Sandwich Islands. Both commodities are admitted into this country under the present treaty free of duty.

Annexation would forever keep our markets free for the admission of both of these articles. Representing, as I do, a district whose main dependence is in these two products, I take it that I have the right to voice the opinion and to advocate the rights of my people in opposition to this "scheme."

Laborers, mechanics, and chemists in the sugar fields and refineries of Louisiana receive good wages to-day. On the rice farms and in the rice mills of southwest Louisiana men find employment readily and at remunerative figures. There no strikes are heard, menacing the security of the community. No injunctions are resorted to to coerce one man to starve that his more fortunate neighbor might enrich himself. There the shrill and discordant voice of anarchy is never heard. There there is contentment and happiness and plenty. Men enjoy more independence and liberty there than anywhere on earth. Your proposition is to strike a deathly blow at all these blessings.

In the great West men are learning to appreciate the possibilities of sugar-beet culture. Up to recently it seemed to be the one ambition of the Secretary of Agriculture to advance and foster the sugar-beet industry in the section of the country from which he hails. We in Louisiana felt that the beet sugar would at no distant time supplant cane sugar, because it can be produced cheaper, but we welcomed our neighbors in this field of operation. Their competition was to be American competition amongst American citizens, white man competing against white man. We were glad to meet them, and we would have rejoiced at their success; but what do you propose to do with this budding hope of the West? Suffocate it, stifle it, strangle it, together with its older brother of the South; and for what and for whom? For a trade in which the American people lose three times as much as they gain. For a race of negroes, of Chinese, half-breeds, and lepers.

What have these done that they should be paid to receive better treatment at our father's house than we, the children, should have?

Pause and consider before you take such a course. The step into the abyss is easily taken; once taken it can never be retraced. For all time to come, should you annex Hawaii, must my people surrender to these people their heritage and the West her hopes of adding to her already great achievements in agriculture? And the surrender will be all the more mortifying when in return we shall receive a "mess of pottage."

But, says the Secretary of Agriculture and the advocates of annexation here, you overestimate the possibilities of sugar and rice in the Hawaiian Islands. Let us see if this is so.

In Hawaii, the Philippines, and the West Indies sugar cane is indigenous to the soil. Here it is not. Sugar can there be raised, according to governmental statistics, at a cost of 1½ cents per pound. Here it costs nearly 4 cents. To the sugar trust, which controls the entire imported output, transportation is cheap.

How long then, I ask, can our people maintain this unequal and unjust competition? You great protectors of American labor and American industries, answer me this, if you dare.

a The collector of customs at San Francisco, under date of February 26, 1886, forwards a statement of his appraiser that the polariscopic test of the Hawaiian sugar brought into that port during the fiscal years 1884 and 1885 would average a little above 99°. The estimated duty remitted, has, therefore, since 1883, been computed, on sugar not above No. 13, at 2½ cents per pound, which is the equivalent of the polariscopic test above indicated.

b Duty remitted calculated only to April 1, 1891, when sugar imported from all countries was made free.

Our loss in governmental revenues from this treaty from sugar alone is nearly $60,000,000, while from rice importations five millions more were lost to us. Annexation will perpetuate this condition of affairs, and with the continued increase of the production of sugar on the four islands comprising the coveted territory we must expect to surrender to these people every year from five to eight million dollars of our revenues, for what? For the pleasure of paying the national debt of the people of the islands, of protecting them from foreign invasion, building up their commerce, and fortifying their coast.

Strange as it may seem, the strongest supporters of this "scheme" are the men who wrote in their party platform in 1896 these words:

Resolved, We condemn the present (Democratic) Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

In the face of this solemn declaration, this harrowing condemnation of the Democratic party, we find the President, elected on that platform, advocating this "scheme." We find his Secretary of Agriculture in one breath urging the West to engage in sugar raising and in the other advocating the annexation of Hawaii, with the full knowledge that this must be the ultimate destruction of that industry. We find the Republican majority of the House committee urging to a man the annexation of these islands. And, finally, we see practically a solid Republican vote back of the resolution.

Why give us a tariff on sugar if you propose to admit free of duty more sugar than the American people consume? Did you give it to us that the differential in favor of the sugar trust might not appear isolated? Did you offer us assistance that our destruction might be more keenly felt? Is it another exemplification of the Greeks bearing gifts? The ancient proverb said that the gods made blind those whom they would destroy, but you would seem to pet and pamper your victims.

But whenever you confront these modern sleight-of-hand platform manipulators with this declaration, they reply that the Hawaiian Islands produce too little sugar and rice to affect the American price of either. This same argument was advanced when the treaty was being discussed in 1875, yet this treaty stimulated the sugar production in the islands fully forty-five fold since 1877. The islands then produced 10,183,556 pounds of sugar, while last year the production was 451,196,980 pounds.

But let us examine this statement more closely. We are great sugar eaters. We consume, next to the English, more sugar than any other people on earth. Our consumption is 64½ pounds of sugar per capita per annum. In 1897 we consumed 2,096,263 tons, or a little over 4,000,000,000 pounds. Louisiana produced of this 631,699,561 pounds; other American States, 12,475,763 pounds; total American production, 644,175,323 pounds. We imported from Hawaii, free of duty, 431,196,980 pounds, making a total of 1,075,372,303 pounds. This is over 25 per cent of our entire consumption.

If we annexed Hawaii and her sister islands and stopped there, perhaps my complaint would be ill-founded. But listen to the "tale of woe" of the annexationists. First, we simply wanted the Sandwich Islands because they were necessary to us in our Asiatic trade. In the other Chamber the discussions on this proposition were long and extended. We must have the islands, said they, because Pearl Harbor, in the Island of Oahu, is necessary for our defense. In case of war our western coast would be at the mercy of our enemies. Lo and behold, the war did come, and the false prophets saw the conditions of their prophecy reversed. Not our coast was in danger, but the enemy's possessions, 5,000 miles farther east. And, with these conditions confronting them, we find them playing on the other string. We must have the islands, say they now, so as to maintain our possessions in the East.

It is clear to my mind that the possession of Hawaii is but the entering wedge to a colonial policy by this Government.

The "scheme" is not only to possess ourselves of Hawaii, but maintain sovereignty over the Philippines and Puerto Rico, once these are captured, as captured they must be in this war. And then, pursuing the policy further, to subsequently declare we are unable to maintain a "stable government" in Cuba, and take her, too.

That this is the policy of the present Administration is apparent even to the blind.

Now, what will all this mean to the sugar and rice industries of this country?

Following is our sugar importations from the islands:

Islands.	Year.	Pounds.
Philippines	1897	72,463,577
	1898	274,809,362
	1899	85,607,317
Puerto Rico	1898	116,653,909
	1897	576,280,597
Cuba	1894	2,127,497,454

I have arranged these figures in this shape for this reason: In the last few years all of these islands have been in revolution. Particularly is this true of Cuba. The result has been that, in
